PUBLISHERS' NOTE

THE present volume completes this edition of Swift's Prose Works, and the publishers hope that the value of the contents may compensate in some measure for the delay in its appearance.

It is with great regret that they have to record the death of Sir Frederick Falkiner, which occurred while the volume was passing through the press. His Essay on the Portraits of Swift and Stella was the result of researches extending over many years, and the information he had gathered enabled him to solve many of the difficulties connected with this complicated subject. Sir Frederick's death has been swiftly and tragically followed by that of his son, Mr. C. Litton Falkiner, to whose interest and assistance these volumes also owe much. He was engaged at the time of his death on an edition of Swift's Correspondence which was planned to form a companion to the Prose Works.¹ The loss of both father and son will be deeply felt in the world of scholarship and letters.

The Essay by Dr. Bernard, Dean of St. Patrick's, on the Relations between Swift and Stella embodies much new information, and though it is, perhaps, too much to say that it finally settles this much-disputed question, it will probably convince most readers that the marriage between Swift and Stella did actually take place.

The most important section of the volume is that containing the Bibliography. Mr. Temple Scott had always contemplated compiling this himself, but circumstances prevented him from carrying out his intention, and the work has been undertaken by Mr. W. Spencer Jackson. The laborious nature of the task may be judged from the fact that this is the first time that a Bibliography has been published recording, with any claims to completeness, all Swift's writings, both in prose and verse. Further information as to the scope and method of his work is given by Mr. Jackson in his prefatory note on page 109.

It is hoped that this work will now be carried out by Mr. Falkiner's friend and executor, Mr. F. Elrington Ball.

The Index to the twelve volumes has been compiled by Miss Constance Jacob, whose researches have enabled her to clear up many doubtful points of identity and similar difficulties.

Of the two portraits of Swift given in this volume, one, the frontispiece, is reproduced by permission of the Countess of Drogheda from the painting at Moore Abbey attributed to Slaughter (see pp. 35-36), while the other is from the water colour by Sir T. A. Jones, referred to in the footnote on page 53.

THE PORTRAITS OF SWIFT

BY

THE RT. HON. SIR FREDERICK R. FALKINER, K.C.

OF THE PORTRAITS, BUSTS AND ENGRAVINGS OF SWIFT AND THEIR ARTISTS

THERE is no evidence in all the sea of Swiftian epistles, spreading over his lifetime, nor in all the waves of his successive biographies, that the Dean's portrait in oils was ever taken originally and from the life, save by Charles Jervas and by Francis Bindon, unless indeed we include those by his friend Pope, hereinafter mentioned. Further, there is no evidence of any portrait by Jervas save in Swift's palmy days of Queen Anne, or within a few years after, whilst those days were still fresh in London memories ; nor of any portrait by Bindon previous to his darker days of George II.'s time. Very many copies of these originals were made both in his life and afterwards, several of which now existing may have been, and some of which indubitably were, replicas or duplicates by these artists themselves. It is these far scattered copies which now baffle the inquiry after the truly authenticated originals in too many instances. There are "Swifts" on the walls of our most noted galleries, both public and private, of which there is no record of whence they first came, nor even a tradition of their pedigree. A single apathetic life-tenant often permits the links of a century to be lost in the title of an heirloom. It is not such carelessness merely which perplexes the searcher after the true Swifts. Even the consummate artists of the eighteenth century received £75 for a portrait which now sells for £7,500 ; so in the earlier years of that age the temptation to the artist would seem often to have been irresistible to eke out his income by a few repetitions on the sly, so sure of a market when the great Dean was his sitter. That this practice was suspected even by the patrons who gave commissions for the portraits, is evident in the case of the absolutely authentic Bindon, again referred to, now in Howth Castle. Writing in July, 1735, the then Lord Howth thanks "my good dean of St. Patricks for the honour he did me in sitting for his picture," and adds: "I have wrote to Dr. Grattan to give Mr. Bindon strict charge in the finishing of it, and when that is done to bring it to his house for fear I should get a Copy instead of the Original." Dr. Grattan is to take it out of the artist's house and hands. The copies by unknown brushes have enhanced the perplexity, so that one honest inquirer, at least, after a two years' hunt, has been forced to forgo the hope of truly identifying half the "genuine" Swifts in the homes and the collections of Ireland and England, or of tracing several of which there was once the clearest contemporary proof. He, however, now writes the result of his search in the hope that its publication may lead to the discovery of some at least of the missing links of evidence.

It was not mere curiosity that set him upon this search. It was thus: when early in the last century Sir Walter Scott was foraging for his first great edition of Swift's works, he was advised by Lady Charlotte Rawdon, and afterwards by many others, to "go to Berwick," as the person then most deeply skilled in the subject of his researches. This was the Rev. Edward Berwick who, as was Lady Charlotte, was one of the Whig constellation of which Grattan, Lord Charlemont, Plunket, Lord Moira, and Curran, were chief stars. So to Ireland he came, and to Berwick, who, he says, treated him with the most flattering kindness. From him he obtained some of the most valuable of the then unpublished Swiftiana; for example, the Vanessa Correspondence and the Legion Club. Mr. Berwick had then two portraits of Swift and one of Stella, of the last of which Sir Walter says, "The only portrait of Stella known to exist is in possession of my kind and respected friend the Rev. Mr. Berwick."¹ A letter from Grattan to Berwick, in 1805, congratulates him on his having been presented by Mr., afterwards Lord, Plunket, with Swift's picture.² These three portraits descended to Judge Berwick, his son, who was lost in the Abergele disaster, in 1868, and thence to his brother Edward Berwick, sometime the eminent President of Queen's College, Galway. His widow, Mrs. Harriette Berwick, who died in 1894, bequeathed the Stella portrait and one of the Swifts to two relatives and myself in trust for a health retreat for young girls, to be founded out of her fortune in memory of her only child. The Home now lies at the foot of the Dublin Hills. It was the trustees' duty of appraising the value of the bequest which induced an inquiry into their pedigree, leading to a quest after all authentic likenesses, painted, engraved, or sculptured.

Swift's earliest authentic portrait was almost certainly that by Jervas, now in the Bodleian at Oxford. It is the premier portrait in every sense, painted when he was in the zenith of his manhood and his fame, and in the very crisis of his fortunes; begun when he was the darling of the Whigs and finished just as he was about to be the darling of the Tories. In 1709, on his first mission from the Irish Church to obtain Queen Anne's First Fruits, when in the political confidence of Godolphin the prime minister, of Lord Somers, and of Wharton the lord lieutenant, the bosom friend of Addison and Steele, and friend of Congreve and Prior, familiar favourite of Lord Pembroke, the late lord lieutenant, of Lord

Halifax and Lord Berkeley, spoiled child of court ladies and literary blue stockings, he first sat to Jervas, who was now court painter. The artist was not quite satisfied, and when Swift left London in March, 1709, the picture lay unfinished. In September, 1710, he came back to resume his mission, surly with the ministers both for his own and the Church's sake, for they had declined to advise the grant of the First Fruits save on the impossible condition of the bishops supporting a repeal of the Test Act, and the luscious promises of his own advancement were all unfulfilled by his statesmen friends. The cabinet was now breaking to pieces. Sunderland and Godolphin were already dismissed, and when, calling on the latter, he was received "with a great deal of coldness," the cup of his fury was full. Courted by the incoming Tories, he was introduced to Harley, about to be prime minister within a few weeks, and he broke with the Whigs for ever. In his first letter from London to Stella, on 9th September, he says: "On Monday Jervas is to retouch my picture," and on the 11th that he had sat four hours that morning to Jervas, "who has given my picture quite another turn and now approves it entirely." Latent traits had probably revealed themselves to the artist in those four hours, for indeed the painter poring on the face seems to have found the "man" behind it, and at least suggests the many-sided mind: the overflowings from the wells of audacious humour are seen in the flashing blue eyes, in the double deep-dimpled chin, and the curl at the corners of the strong, full, slightly pouting lips; the high, retreating forehead indicates the wealth of fancy and memory within, whilst the set of the head and boldness of the regard disclose the haughty conscious self-belief. And then there is assuredly an undertone of sadness, of the shadow that haunted his brilliancy always, the dark quality which proved that the most sparkling fountains sprang from gloomy caverns below. This was the look which Pope, when remarking to Spence that it was very like, seems to have seen in it;¹ for at the same time he spoke of the "dullness" which he saw sometimes overshadow his friend's countenance, though the "look of uncommon archness in eyes quite azure as the heavens" was familiar and dear to him. Scanning the face, one thinks of what he was thinking of as he sat to the painter in those autumn days, and recalls that he was that week beginning his immortal Journal to Stella, replete with endearing diminutives and pungent personalities on all people he met of all degrees, that he was at the same time meditating his happy lines on the City Shower, and his lampoon of revenge on Godolphin, "Sid Hamet," the fallen minister breaking his staff of office when the Queen dismissed him, and we think we can trace the laughing raillery that animates all these, and even the vindictive spirit which breathes in the last: there is there also a trait of the insolent playfulness so innate in him, which a year before animated his "Decree" that all ladies who aspired to his acquaintance must make the first advances, and the greater the quality the greater the advances, which he enforced in fact even on duchesses.

This portrait is the type of the English Swift. I have assumed the identity of the Bodleian portrait with Jervas's original of 1710, though there is some weakness in actual proof. We know that in 1716 Vertue finely engraved the original under the careful supervision of Jervas himself, who thought the work could be improved, for he writes to Pope in 1715: "I intend this day to call at Vertue's to see Swift's brought a little more like."² This engraving is well reproduced in the frontispiece of Forster's Life—the angle of the face, the port and set of the head, the position of the forehead between the curls of the wig, and of the double chin over the linen bands, are identical in the Bodleian portrait and in this engraving. In the latter the lips are given a stronger mien, but the change is just such as would be made in "bringing the likeness a little more like."

The Bodleian portrait was presented to the University of Oxford by Alderman Barber in the Spring, 1739, under very high auspices, after concerting with the Vice-Chancellor and the two who with Swift were the consummate geniuses of the age, Lord Bolingbroke and Alexander Pope. Richardson, the agent of the London plantation in Derry, of which Barber was then the presiding Governor, writes to Swift an account of the ceremony on April 10th: "Your friend Mr. Alderman Barber, whose veneration for you prompts him to do anything he can think of that can show his respect and affection, made a present to the University of Oxford of the original picture done for you by Jervas, to do honour to the University by your being placed in the Gallery among the most renowned and distinguished personages this island has produced: but first had a copy taken, and then had the original set in a fine rich frame, and sent it to Oxford after concerting with Lord Bolingbroke, the Vice-chancellor and Mr. Pope, as I remember, the inscription to be under the picture a copy whereof is enclosed. The alderman had a very handsome compliment from the Vice-chancellor in the name of all the heads of houses there, and by their direction: wherein there is most honourable mention of the Dean of St. Patrick's."

This letter mentions an article in the "London Evening Post" of the same date, a copy of which has been kindly given me from the British Museum, which after referring to the portrait by Bindon, which had just then been presented by the Chapter of St. Patrick's for the Deanery House, describes the presentation at Oxford, and adds, "It is somewhat remarkable that different kingdoms at the same juncture should conspire together in showing their zeal and publick spirit to perpetuate the memory of that great Patriot without knowing each other's intentions." The inscription is:

JONATHAN SWIFT,
Decan. S. Patric. Dubl.
Effigiem viri Musis amicissimi,
Ingenio prorsus sibi proprio celeberrimi,
Ut ipsum suis Oxoniensibus aliquatenus
Redoneret
Parietem habere voluit Bodleianum,
A.D. MDCCXXXIX,
Johannes Barber, Armiger
Aldermannus.
Nec ita pridem Prætor Londinensis.

The line "Of a genius entirely peculiar to himself" well expresses the essentiality of Swift's faculty, and might almost be translated by his own comment, "And what he writ was all his own," confirmed by the criticism of Cardinal Polignac, that Swift had l'esprit créateur.

Barber is himself noteworthy. In 1711, he and Ben. Tooke became Swift's printers, and through him in the four last years of Queen Anne, were poured forth on the world those avalanches of pamphlets, pasquinades, and poems, with which Swift maintained the Tory Ministry, doing for them in days when reporting was unknown what statesmen now do for themselves through Hansard, the morning press, the platform and the electric telegraph. Swift writes first of him to Stella in 1711 as "one Barber a printer," but their connection soon warmed to a lifelong friendship, for Barber had tact and talents which won for him and kept the good graces of all the Tory magnates, Harley and Bolingbroke, Pope, Arbuthnot, Prior and Gay, long after the Tory downfall. For him Swift indulged that passion for patronage which was almost a cacoethes with him, getting him from Harley the Gazetteership just taken from Steele, the printership to the Ordnance from Lord Rivers, who succeeded Marlborough, and the same office with the Great South Sea Company. When Anne was dying and Harley and Bolingbroke in open war, the latter used Barber to lure back Swift to London as the only prop that could save the sinking party, calling him familiarly "Johannes Tonsor." Swift in those days dined with Barber alternately with the Prime Minister, and in a letter to Swift Barber signs himself "Tyrant," indicating what they both conceived even then to be the power of the Press. When the Scottish lords, headed by the Duke of Argyle, came to the Queen demanding revenge on the villainous libeller, who in "The Public Spirit of the Whigs" called the Scots "a poor fierce northern people," whose union brought England only a pauper nobility, the pamphlet had run to the fifth edition, and all London save the Scotch were in a roar at such passages as, speaking of the Union, "I imagine a person of quality prevailed on to marry a woman much his inferior and without a groat to her fortune, and her friends arguing she was as good as her husband because she brought him as numerous a family of relations and servants as she found in his house," and "I could point out some with great titles" whose "whole revenues before that period would have ill maintained a Welsh Justice of the Peace, and have since gathered more money [in England] than ever any Scotchmen who had not travelled could form an idea of." Author and printer were now in a common peril. Barber, arrested, refused to betray his author on the ground that it might criminate himself. He was kept in prison and on the brink of ruin, but the Prime Minister by a ruse saved him, ordering a public prosecution which closed Barber's mouth, and then sending £150 to Swift to indemnify the printer and publisher. Time was gained till the wrath of the Scots had cooled, and even they had learned to laugh at the jokes of which they were the victims.

Barber lost the Government places when the new King came, but his nest was now feathered. He was one of the few who, in the burst of the South Sea Bubble, six years afterwards, became a millionaire, and though he lost again in the speculations of the day, he kept £50,000, bought a fine estate at Richmond, rose in the City, was Lord Mayor in 1733 and afterwards Chief Governor of the Londonderry Company; and in these capacities renewed close correspondence with the Dean, repaying old kindness by several appointments of the Dean's protégés, including the vaurien Pilkington as Chaplain to the Lord Mayor. Swift, in their late correspondence, calls him his dear old friend of thirty years, and his letters breathe with an affection such as he showed to no one else save Pope.

The identity of the Bodleian portrait with the Jervas of 1710 would be more assured, if we knew for whom the latter was originally painted. It was not for Barber, whom Swift did not then know, and it was certainly not for Swift himself. On the 26th October, 1710, he tells Stella: "I will try some contrivance to get a copy of my picture from Jervas. I'll make Sir Andrew Fountaine buy one ás for himself, and I'll pay him again and take it, that is provided I have money to spare when I leave this." This points to Sir A. Fountaine as Jervas's client, and thus entitled to order a replica which, openly at least, he would not paint for others. Fountaine was a man of good fortune, and accomplished; as a good Oxford Latinist he was knighted by William III., and afterwards travelling in Italy and collecting coins he met Lord Pembroke, who, when made Lord Lieutenant, took him to Dublin Castle as Usher of the Black Rod. There, with the earl himself, Swift and Sterne, the Dean's predecessor at St. Patrick's, Ashe, Bishop of Clogher, and his two brothers, Dilly and Tom, Fountaine formed the punning coterie, calling themselves Castilians. When Lord Pembroke retired in 1707, Swift and Fountaine crossed the channel with him, the Viceroy and Fountaine bound for Wilton, where many of Sir Andrew's coins and medals still are to be seen. He had a family seat, Narford in Norfolk, where Forster found with his lineal descendant,

Mr. Fountaine, some most valuable MSS. of Swift, including the Castilian records, and the original Baucis and Philemon, as written before Addison "corrected it by expurgating some of its wittiest couplets." He was in London in 1710 and the year following, and introduced Swift to Mrs. Vanhomrigh, with whom we find them both dining or supping fifteen times, rather basely recorded by Swift to Stella, as if Sir Andrew and Mrs. Van, as he calls her, were the attraction, when we can well guess he was planting the lethalis arundo in poor Vanessa's heart, whilst, as in her agony years afterwards she sang, she was Still listening to his tuneful tongue;

The truths which angels might have sung,
Divine imprest their gentle sway,
And sweetly stole my soul away.

Sir Henry Craik, it may be added, expresses no doubt that the Bodleian portrait is the original of 1710.

Richardson's letter says, as we have seen, that Barber, before making the presentation to Oxford, took care to have a copy taken. By whom was it taken? Jervas indeed was then still alive, but an invalid, and very near the close. Where is this copy now?

(2) The Swift correspondence discloses a portrait by Jervas of special interest, if we could identify it now. Lord Oxford's Jervas. The second Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, son of Harley, Queen Anne's last premier, writing to Swift from Dover Street in August, 1725, after his father's death, says: "The picture I have of you is the same which Mr. Jervas drew of you in Ireland, and it is very like you and is a very good picture; and though Mr. Jervas is honoured with the place of his Majesty's painter he cannot paint a picture I shall so much value as I do that of the Dean of St. Patrick's." And in a previous letter he says:

"I have the pleasure of seeing a picture which is very like you every day, and is as good a picture as ever Jervas painted." This was, therefore, most probably painted during Jervas's long visit to Ireland, whither he went for a professional stay in 1716-17, whence Pope, seeking to lure him home, says: "Come then, and having peopled Ireland with a world of beautiful shadows, come to us, and see with that eye which, like the eye of the world, creates beauties by looking at them."¹ In this Irish visit he painted the Dean's dear friend Parnell, the poet, who was then Archdeacon of Clogher and rector of Finglas, just outside Dublin. This portrait was painted by Jervas for Pope who, on seeing it, complained that it was infinitely less lively than that he carried habitually about with him.² Lord Oxford's Jervas was presumably painted for Harley himself, towards whom in that year, 1716-17, in his downfall and sore peril, Swift was exhibiting a loving devotion and sympathy which does the highest honour to both, and which alone would vindicate Swift from the charges of self-seeking so often made by political foemen in his own and later days. Where, too, is this historic picture now? I have laboured ineffectually to trace it. This Lord Oxford's daughter became Duchess of Portland in 1734, on her marriage to the second duke, and the bulk of the Harley possessions thereon passed to the family of Cavendish Bentinck, and it might have been surmised that so prized a possession as this might be in the great collection of Welbeck, but inquiry has ascertained that this is not so. Can this be one of the extant traditional Jervases without clear pedigrees which we now enumerate, and if so, which of them?

(3) The portrait in the National Portrait Gallery in Trafalgar Square, of which a reproduction appears as fron-

This piece in the fifth volume of this edition of Swift's Prose Works, is strikingly excellent. It is unquestionably either by the same hands that painted the Bodleian Swift or copied from the same artist, for the port and contour of the head, and the relative positions of the wig to the forehead, and the bands to the double chin are identical in each ; though in the Bodleian the regard is direct, slightly turned to the looker between shoulders which face him, whilst in this Swift is seated at his writing-table, from which he turns neck and head as if to some one who had come to him when at work, and this imparts an additional animation to his vivid countenance. What we know of this portrait is that it belonged to the last Marquess of Hastings, who died in 1868, and at the sale of his possessions in 1869 this "Swift" was purchased by Messrs. Graves, of Pall Mall, for the National Portrait Gallery, but without a pedigree. This Lord Hastings was grandson of the first Marquess, the eminent Governor-General of India, previously Francis Rawdon, Earl of Moira in the Irish peerage, who, with his countess, were leaders of Dublin society a hundred years ago. Moira House was then the Dublin counterpart of Holland House, the graceful centre of the wit, intellect, and celebrity of their day, which ranged on the Whig side. Alas ! for the vicissitudes in the lives of noble homes. Moira House, that once sparkled with diamonds and beauty still more sparkling, is now the Mendicity House on the north quays of the Liffey. It is almost certain that its treasures once included a portrait of the Dean, for the independence of Ireland was one of its watchwords, and if we may hazard a conjecture, we may well suggest that the last Marquess inherited this from his Rawdon grandsire. Lady Charlotte Rawdon, who, as we have seen, sent Sir Walter Scott to Mr. Berwick, was sister of this first Marquess of Hastings. The surmise, if vain, may at least help towards a truer identification of one of the most interesting subjects in the great National Collection.

(4) The portrait in the Irish National Gallery, a reproduction of which fronts the Drapier's letters in the sixth volume of this edition, and which, following the old Dublin Catalogue, is mentioned there as once in the possession of Judge Berwick, and ascribed to Francis Bindon, is manifestly by Jervas, and the entry is accordingly corrected in the new catalogue. A glancing comparison of the two types, the Jervases and the Bindons, demonstrates this. Every line stamps its parentage as identical with that of the Bodleian original, and all the known Bindons are, as we have said, twenty years later than the latest of the Jervases. The mistake originated in the notice of Bindon in the "Dictionary of National Biography," and is easily explained. Monck Mason, in 1819, states that the Rev. Edward Berwick then possessed a portrait by Bindon,¹ but in the same page he states that the same Mr. Berwick has a good head of Swift by Jervas. Both these descended to the late Judge Berwick, his son, from whose representatives the National Gallery obtained the Swift portrait now in Leinster Lawn; but this is as assuredly Berwick's Jervas as that in our possession, hereafter referred to, is Berwick's Bindon, and a good head of Swift this Jervas certainly is, and in our view one of the most characteristic of the Irish immortals which from the walls of this gallery salute one, as in a dream, with the smiles of two hundred years ago.

(5) There is an excellent Swift of the Jervas type in the collection of the Earl of Darnley, at Cobham Hall, to which I was led by the kindness of Mr. Lionel Cust, the courteous curator of the National Portrait Gallery. It is a quarter-length, and has all the air of an original, but I could not ascertain its genesis, as it has been for generations in its present home. Lord Darnley, in the male or Irish line, was in the days of Swift and of Jervas the first Earl, his older title being Lord Clifton in the Irish peerage; his residence was in his county, Meath, not very far from Laracor, Swift's old rectory before he became Dean. His son, the third Earl, married Miss Stoyte, of the family of Alderman Stoyte, of whom Swift writes so affectionately in the Journal to Stella as belonging to the coterie or club of which Stella herself was a star, and which included Dean Sterne, Swift's predecessor in St. Patrick's, and Archdeacon Walls, who laughed and played ombre whilst Swift was in London. And so it is probable, indeed, that this Cobham portrait is an heirloom handed down to the present noble owner from his ancestor in Meath, who was pretty sure to have an original from the Queen Anne period.

(6) There is an admirable Swift by Jervas in Lord Sackville's interesting gallery at Knole, in Kent, to which I
 The Knole
 Jervas. was directed by my right honourable friend Mr. Justice Madden, who first saw it at the Guelph Loan exhibition in 1891, and thought it one of the most striking and interesting portraits of that collection. There is strong ground for believing this to be authentic and original, for, at least till lately, it hung in the room known for a century and a half as Lady Betty Germaine's. She was one of Swift's oldest, most faithful, and latest friends. When her father, the Earl of Berkeley, came to govern Ireland as one of the Lords Justices, in 1699, Swift, then little more than thirty, came with him as chaplain to Dublin Castle, and soon became the life and soul of the family, the Countess, her incomparable daughters, as Swift calls them, and all the retinue of the household. They joked and punned incessantly: the young chaplain immortalized the servant's hall in Mrs. Frances Harris, the housemaid's, "Loss of her purse," and Lady Betty, who was full of fun, wrote competitive doggerels with his reverence :

With these is Parson Swift,
Not knowing how to spend his time,
Does make a wretched shift
To deafen them with puns and rhyme.

And when the Berkeleys left the Castle, in 1701, Swift went back with them and was their guest at Cranford, where he perpetrated his felicitous fraud on the Countess, passing off his Meditation on a Broomstick as one of the saintly Robert Boyle's Meditations. The intimacy with Lady Betty abided long after her father's and her mother's death, and up to that of the Dean himself. She became the wife of Sir John Germaine of Drayton, in Northamptonshire, from which many of her letters to Swift were written, and of which she became sole owner by her husband's will. She left Drayton to Lord George Sackville, of Minden memory, who was the third son of Lionel, Duke of Dorset, long Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and owner of Knole, in which Lady Betty's apartments, a bed-room and dressing-room, are still pointed out. As Drayton was famous for its portraits and old china when Horace Walpole was there in 1783, nothing unproved can be more reasonably sure than that its mistress possessed an authentic likeness of her friend the Dean, and that this would pass to Knole, either in her own time or that of Lord George, or when Lord George's son became last Duke of Dorset and owner of Knole.

(7) Jervas painted another fine portrait of the Dean which I have not as yet been able to trace, but which this notice may help to find. It was beautifully engraved by P. Fourdrinier about 1734, under Jervas's supervision. It would seem to be a copy of his original painting of 1711. In 1734 he writes from Hampton to Swift that Mrs. Pendarves has been made happy with one of these engravings, adding: "I do not fail to distribute them to all your well-wishers."¹ In 1736 the Right Hon. Thomas Carter, who was Master of the Rolls in Ireland and Secretary of State, writes to Swift in relation to this engraving:² "I have no doubt the painter will have occasion for a great many cargoes from our friend Mr. Jervas." Carter was a gentleman of notable literary connection, for his wife was the widow of Wentworth Dillon, the poet Earl of Roscommon. A note in Faulkner's edition of Swift's Works, 1758, states "that this fine print of the Dean was engraved from an original picture painted by Jervas, which was afterwards purchased by the Earl of Chesterfield and placed in his elegant library in May Fair in his collection of English authors." Chesterfield is not now in the occupation of the Stanhopes, but if the old collection still exists Fourdrinier's engraving would suffice to identify Jervas's original. Between this and his first portrait twenty years would seem to have elapsed, for he is not known to have been in Ireland after 1721, and the Dean was not in England after 1727.

field's Jervas.

(8) In 1850 Messrs. Christie and Manson sold a portrait of Swift for the Earl of Bessborough, sent over from Ireland. It is specified in the catalogue as by Jervas, and was purchased by a Mr. Page, but he appears to have been a commission agent, and I have been as yet unable to trace this portrait further. It might certainly have been more probable that the Bessborough collection should have contained a Swift by Bindon, who was the architect of Bessborough house, where, as we shall see, there is a portrait of that artist himself, than one by Jervas, but this note may possibly lead to an identification.

CHARLES JERVAS

As an artist, Jervas's fate is that of the over-praised, on whom the world takes vengeance by undue disparagement. In the next generation Horace Walpole, in 1771, says his works are wretched daubings, light and flimsy;¹ yet we may challenge the authority of a critic who in the same breath dooms to the garrets of their grandchildren the family portraits painted by the artists of his own day, for these comprise Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney, whose works now sell for a hundredfold the guerdon of the artists. Even in his own heyday, indeed, his friend Dr. Arbuthnot denounced him thus: "You are, nevertheless, a practical believer, you strictly observe the second Commandment, for in your pictures you make not the likeness of anything in the heaven above or in the earth beneath or in the waters under the earth." This, however, was a sally provoked by some infidel talk in which Jervas was indulging. Again, when in full fashion, with a handsome house in Cleveland Court, St. James's, he set up a coach and horses, someone spoke of this to Sir Godfrey Kneller, who exclaimed, "Ach, mine Got, if his horses do not draw better than he does, he will never get to his journey's end." But the Dutchman was probably a little jealous, for Jervas was now competing successfully for the favour of the town. Contemporary favour is some set-off, and as against Walpole we may set the estimates of Steele and Pope and Lady Mary W. Montagu, who in her admiration of the beauties of the Harem at Constantinople said Jervas was the painter she wished to see them.² In the very year he first painted Swift, Steele in the fourth "Tatler" (18 April, 1709) describes two portraits Jervas, lately returned from Rome, was then painting. They were of Court beauties he calls "Chloe" and "Clarissa." Their "different perfections," he says, "are suitably represented by the last great painter Italy has sent us, Mr. Jervas;" Chloe as a country girl, showing the great mastery of the painter, in a straw hat and ribbons, Clarissa set by the skilful hand in a manner that looks artless and innocent of the torment she gives. And he certainly did get to his journey's end with very considerable success, for he succeeded Sir G. Kneller as Court Painter to George I. and as such was retained by George II., and he could set against his critics the public favour, from royalty down, by which the greatest celebrities and beauties of his day sat to him, many of them whilst Kneller was still painting, and who from a hundred walls still bear him witness for good or ill; and this success may have the more piqued Kneller's criticism, as Jervas had been his pupil. He painted Sir Isaac Newton for the Royal Society, and Dr. Arbuthnot for the College of Physicians. Addison sat to him in 1716, Pope three times at least, and George II. in 1728 for his portrait in the Guildhall. In Anne's time he was already a favourite with the Court beauties and fell in love with one of the loveliest, the Lady Elizabeth Spencer, Marlborough's third daughter, when now Countess of Bridgewater, not very long before her death in 1714, when she was only seven-and-twenty. But if a great poet could have created him a great artist, he would now be one of the greatest of English names. Pope saw him with a poet's vision, in which he was transfigured. As Spenser says of the poets:

They do those men in golden thrones repose,
Whose merits they to glorifie do chose.

When engaged with the "Iliad" and writing the "Rape of the Lock," Pope, thinking he himself had artistic talents, put himself under Jervas's tutelage in 1713, and thenceforth they were fast friends. The pupilage lasted the greater part of the year, in which Pope finding out his own weakness naturally magnified his master's power. So now they are together to personify the twin arts of Painting and Poetry. "I am copying," he writes him in 1714 (July 28), "the great master [Homer] in one art with the same love and diligence with which the painters hereafter will copy you in another," and again (Aug. 16), "It is not I that am to tell you what an artist you are, nor is it you that are to tell me what a poet I am, but it is from the world abroad we hope, piously hope, to hear these things."¹ And Pope proved that if the poet cannot make an artist great, at least he can make him immortal, for his "Epistle to Jervas," the first draft of which he made in that year, 1714, he afterwards polished into one of the most sparkling gems even in his own lyric crown, combining and co-relating their mutual powers, and declaring how they

Like friendly colours found them both unite,
And each from each contract new strength and light.

Thus in imagination they visit Italy together, the painter to ponder over Raphael's tomb, and the poet in the haunts of Virgil and Cicero, and thence to the monuments of the eternal city, where they are to Build imaginary Rome anew.

Then mourning the transiency of the loveliness of the ladies his friend had painted, he foreshadows his glory in transmitting them to posterity. Thus the Countess of Bridgewater's eyes shall still shine:

Beauty, frail flower that every season fears,
Blooms in thy colours for a thousand years.

At least they shall in this poem, of which Walpole remarks that Pope has enshrined the feeble talents of the painter in the lucid amber of his flowing lines.

These lessons in painting Pope took from Jervas have an interesting relation to the known portraits of Pope's Portraits of Swift. Swift, for the poet worked hard, and one of his chief efforts was to paint his friend the Dean. After a year's trial he abandoned art in despair; he says that "when St. Luke painted an angel came and finished the work, and it will be thought hereafter that when I painted, the devil put the last hand to my pieces . . . for I have been so out of conceit with my former performances that I have thrown away three Dr. Swifts, two Duchesses of Montague [another of the Churchills], one Virgin Mary, the Queen of England, besides half a score Earls and a Knight of the Garter, . . . though I find my hand most successful in drawing of friends, insomuch that my masterpieces have been one of Dr. Swift and one of Mr. Betterton."¹ What pity that he should throw away that one masterpiece of Swift! Whatever its faults it would perhaps sell for thousands at Christie's to-day, fetching more than a dozen of his master Jervas's immortals.

Or if personal vanity could make a painter great Jervas would be great indeed. He was an admirable copyist, as proved by his copies of the Raphael cartoons at Hampton Court, which were the admiration of Oxford; and once having copied a Titian he fell back in an attitude to gaze at that picture and at this, and exclaimed in plaintive ecstasy—"Poor little Tit, how he would stare!" When painting the Countess of Bridgewater, very probably snubbed by her Ladyship for showing her his adoration, he said he could not help telling her she had not a handsome ear. "No?" said the lady, "and pray, Mr. Jervas, what is a handsome ear?" The coxcomb raised his finger and pointed to his own.

Pope's high estimate was not quite gratuitous, for Jervas was a most useful friend. Through their long friendship of twenty-seven years there was welcome for the poet of Twickenham at Cleveland Court, when and as often as he pleased; and even when the master was absent it was his house of call, whither he might direct all his correspondence, and leave his manuscripts to be called for; and when in 1716 Jervas went to Ireland for two years, he undertook to solicit subscriptions for the "Iliad" in Trinity College and from all his friends, a service for which Pope was grateful indeed. But the mutual affection was genuine, ending only when Jervas died, 1739, leaving the poet £1,000 legacy. In the summer of 1715 they, with Dr. Arbuthnot and Colonel Disney, made a famous riding party to Bath: they took up Pope at Binfield en route, and then visiting Oxford and several fine country houses as they went, they had a glorious time of it. Years after, in the summer of 1739, when both were failing, Jervas home from Rome, whither he had sought after health, not art, Pope tells a friend he had dined the day before "with Jervas upon a venison pasty where we drank your health warmly but" temperately, "for neither he nor I are well enough to drink wine."¹

The truth is that Jervas had abundant merit in spite of his vanity; he was most good-natured—a decided bon enfant, as vain people sometimes are. He was very clever, not only with brush but pen. He set himself to translate "Don Quixote," though the sneerers said he knew no Spanish; but the version published after his death, in 1742, was in truth a great success, and its fame long survived; it was not superseded by Smollett's translation thirteen years later, which was largely indebted to it. The book contained an essay, by Warburton, of "The Divine Legation,") "On the Origin of Books of Chivalry," of which Pope tells him he never read a thing with more pleasure than an additional sheet to Jervas's preface to "Don Quixote,"—"before I got over two paragraphs I cried out, 'Aut Erasmus aut Diabolus.'"¹

When Swift, with the new glory of "Gulliver" upon him, visited London finally in 1726, he lodged with poor Gay, whose ménage was scanty, and who borrowed the bed linen from Jervas, which he afterwards informs the Dean² he had duly sent home to the owner mended, finely washed, and neatly folded up. Jervas's letters are genial and sprightly, and without the elaborated ease of the literary epistles which the wits of the day, and notably Pope, wrought in writing to their friends. His intimacy with Swift, too, lasted to the end. He writes to the Dean in 1734,³ cordially telling him how Mrs. Pendarves, the beautiful Mary Granville, afterwards the wife of Dr. Delany, has been made happy with a print of you; adding, "And I do not fail to distribute them to all your well-wishers." These were copies either of Vertue's engraving or of Fourdrinier's mentioned later on. He was a great collector of things of art and antiquities, sold off at his death at a three days' auction. Non pudeat Hiberniæ of this warm-hearted and accomplished volatile Irishman, whom yet she would seem to have forgotten. He was born in Dublin in 1675.

THE BINDON PORTRAITS

When we come to the Bindon portraits we are on firmer ground. In his History of St. Patrick's Cathedral, 1819, Monck Mason says there were four pictures of the Dean by this artist, and he enumerates them: (1) That at Howth Castle; (2) that in the Deanery House; (3) the portrait painted for Robert Nugent in 1740, then in the possession of the Marquess of Buckingham; and (4) a three-quarter length, said to be by Bindon, then in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Berwick.

(1.) The pedigree of the first is clear. It still stands in the hall of the ancient Norman castle of Howth, just opposite the entrance, a somewhat awesome presence, and here it was seen by Sir Walter Scott, who thus describes it: "He is represented in the clerical costume. To the left of the figure is seen the Temple of Fame in the background; on the Dean's right appears the genius of Ireland, extending a laurel wreath, as about to crown the patriot: in his left hand he holds forth a scroll on which is written—'The Fourth Drapier's Letter.' At his feet, on the right of the picture, lies bound the famous patentee, Woods, he is depicted in agony. On a scroll is written 'Woods' Patent.'" In this portrait the bright, mischievous archness of his Queen Anne's, or even his George I.'s period, has now vanished, replaced by the haughty melancholy which we can yet readily fancy flashing up in misanthropic scorn or masterful wrath, moods too lightly set down by some to disappointed ambition and exile from his social supremacy in London. For his life was now (1735) on the ebb, though at times the innate spirit of humour would assert itself, even boisterously, and in lucid intervals of his sadness he would be found battledoring fun, like a school-boy, with his playmate, Thomas Sheridan.

This Howth portrait is absolutely authentic: in a pleasant letter, written from Co. Kilkenny, 6th July, 1735, above referred to, Lord Howth, after giving direction to have the picture sent home to him direct, proceeds with a humour evidently borrowed from his correspondent and meant to please him, to caricature the Bishop of Ossory, then a subject of Swift's wrath—"As to reading and working my wife observes your directions. . . . She desires me to tell you that the liking she has to 'the baboon' is out of the true regard she has for you, he being one of your greatest favourites. . . . As for news we have no such thing here; only the baboon has done his visitation: that is, he goes into the churches, and looks about, then asks the tumbler Sykes how long they have been coming. 'So long,' says Sykes: 'Aye,' replies the baboon, 'and we shall be as long going back'; so mounts his horse and away. Who durst say the church is in danger when we have so good bishops." Swift's grudge was this: the bishops in 1731 had brought a bill into the Irish parliament for dividing the larger livings, with the worthy purpose of increasing churches and cures; but it was to be at the expense of the higher parochial clergy; they did not propose to contribute from their episcopal revenues. Dr. E. Tennison, Bishop of Ossory, was a chief promoter. Swift addressed the Commons in a powerful pamphlet, and assailed the bishops in a scathing lampoon, replete with fury and with fun: quoting Latimer as having said that the type of a despotic bishop was Satan himself, the archbishop of Hell, he proceeds—

How nearly this bishop our bishops resembles !
But he has the odds, who believes and who trembles.
Could you see his grim face, for a pound to a penny,
You'd swear it must be the baboon of Kilkenny.

The bill was thrown out, seventeen bishops voting for it: only three with the majority, whom the Dean exalts accordingly. Dr. Tennison was nephew of his namesake, the Archbishop of Canterbury; he came to Ireland as chaplain to the Duke of Dorset in 1730, and was almost immediately promoted to this Irish bishopric, after the mode of the day, and this in itself kindled against him the severe indignation of Swift, who raged against the system with sæva indignatio. A photo-engraving of this Howth portrait appears as frontispiece in the fourth volume of this edition.

(2) The great full-length portrait by Bindon, secondly mentioned by Mason, is still in the Deanery House at St. Patrick's, where Sir Walter Scott saw it. The Deanery Bindon. It was painted in 1739 for the Chapter, who, by a minute dated St. Patrick's day, 1739, state "that the said picture and frame are the property of the Chapter, and they are placed at the instance of the Chapter in the Deanery House to save them from the damage they might suffer from the dampness of the Chapter House, where they were first designed to be placed." This portrait is very like the Howth one, but the lines are more masterful and less sad. Sir Walter describes it thus: "A genius appears in the piece displaying a scroll containing a Latin inscription partly undecipherable. . . . At the bottom of the canvas is the following:

'Effigiem hujus Rev. admodum viri Jonath. Swift S.T.P. Ecclesiae Cath. S. Pat. Dub. Decani, in perpetuum harum aedium, totius cleri, et hujusce praecipuae gentis decus, amoris et observantiae ergo, pingi curavit capitulum suum.

Praesenti tibi maturos largimur honores
Nil oriturum alias, nil ortum tale fatentes.'

"In the back distance . . . is seen in perspective the great western door of the cathedral . . . leading immediately to that aisle in which the illustrious patriot is interred. . . . The frame is of black Irish oak, curiously . . . carved with a variety of emblematical figures, having at the bottom the arms of the Deanery and of Swift quartered in one escutcheon." This portrait ran more danger from another element than from damp. Forty-two years after it was placed there the Deanery House was destroyed by fire, and the then Dean, Dr. Cradock, reardless of the other treasures, rushed for the portrait, and assisted in carrying it forth with a devotion worthy of "pius Aeneas" bearing his father Anchises from the flames of Troy. Sir Walter has an engraving of this portrait as frontispiece of both his editions of Swift, as also has Monck Mason in his "History of St. Patrick's," but in both the cherub, or genius upholding the scroll is omitted, with a questionable taste which was intended to be artistic. The scroll which Sir Walter found undecipherable, has been almost completely interpreted by Dean Bernard thus: "Hujus eximii viri motu Praehon. Rob. comes de Oxford—ravit, Reg. Annae Beatae Memoriae ut Primitia et Decem. Eccles. Hib. de novo Condonarentur." The words in italics are unreadable, but the allusion is clear to the aid rendered by Harley in obtaining from Queen Anne the grant of the First Fruits to the Irish Church, the extortion of which was Swift's first patriotic service, and which occasioned his memorable three years in London, in the absence which produced the deathless "Journal to Stella."

This portrait inspired Swift's friend, the Rev. William Dunkin, of whom more anon, to address the artist in a Latin poem, "Epistola ad Franciscum Bindonem," which, with an English version, was published by Faulkner in 1741. Like too many verses of the age, it has too much about the Muses and things in general; but the evolution of the canvas under the mind and hand of the portrait artist is felt and told with a poet's sensibility:

The canvas—rude and sordid now no more—
Imbibes the growing form at every pore,
Till all compleat, behold—"The Man"—arise,
Strength in his limbs, and lightning in his eyes.

However short this falls of the subtle delicacy of Tennyson, embalming Watts' idea of a true portrait painter :

As when a painter, poring on a face,
Divinely, through all hindrance finds the Man
Behind it, and so paints him that his face,
The shape and colour of a mind and life,
Lives for his children ever at its best.—

it is interesting to read, beside these nobler lines, the effort of the almost unknown Irish poet, written more than a century before. His Latin version is very spirited, speaking of the naked canvas:

Sordet adhuc, donec fuci violatus honore
Paulatim imbiberit speciem, sensimque sequacem
Indurit sese in formam: divinitus, ecce!
Spiritus accendit vultus; vigor excitat artus.

Less happy is his somewhat turgid gratulation of the Chapter on their Bindon portrait. "This grateful monument you raised to Swift, whose voice procured immortal Anna's gift," and goes on to forecast its destiny:

The future youth on this intent shall gaze,
And pant and sicken with a love of praise;
Their boiling blood in larger channels roll,
And all the Patriot kindle in their soul.—

lines which, exaggerated as they are, yet mark the current feeling towards the great tribune in the day of his disappearing.

This portrait is in fine preservation. It hangs in the dining-room of the Deanery House in its appropriate position, looking out at the old Cathedral towers. The present eminent Dean Bernard, who takes an active and loyally keen interest in all local memorials of his illustrious predecessor, has had everything done to do justice to this one. The splendid Irish oak frame which Sir Walter admired, though then falsely lacquered with gilding, is unique, and suggests regret that in the engravings of the nineteenth century this frame and the cherub are omitted. But it was twice engraved and well engraved in mezzotint by Andrew Miller, of Dublin, in Swift's lifetime. These works are still extant. One is full length, inscribed: "Frans Bindon arm. impensis Capituli L. Pat. pinxit A.D. 1739. Andrew Miller fecit. Dub. 1743." The motto:

Non ille pro caris amicis
Aut patria timidus perire.—HOR.

Of this we print a photogravure copy in vol. vii.

The other is a half-length, with the name of the painter and engraver similarly inscribed, but with the mottoes, "Cum Magnis Vixisse" and

Illum aget pennâ metuente solvi
Fama superstes.—HOR.

The full-length engraving does not omit the cherub, which certainly does not take from its interest. There are excellent specimens of both these mezzotints in the National Portrait Gallery of Ireland, presented by Lord Iveagh from the Chaloner Smith Collection.

(3) This Deanery portrait is closely connected with another and earlier genuine Bindon, the existence of which Dean Bernard has lately discovered. I have not yet found where it now is, but the Cathedral records disclose a correspondence so late as 1874 between the then Dean West and Mr. Thomas Bateman, the eminent engineer, who was then the proprietor of Moor Park, in Surrey, the historic home of Sir Wm. Temple, of whose household Swift and Stella were members when William III. was king. There is a letter from Mr. Bateman announcing the safe arrival at Moor Park of the Swift portrait by Bindon which he had just purchased from the Cathedral authorities, and he asks if a portrait of Stella be procurable. The documents indicate that this Swift had been in their possession from the time it was painted, and that when, in 1739, Bindon was engaged at the Deanery portrait, Swift being too ill to give him continuous sittings, he used, to complete it, this smaller one, which was in all probability one of his replicas of the Howth picture painted by him a few years before. The great similarity of the Howth and the Deanery Bindons confirms this view. Mr. Bateman's motive in the purchase being, presumably, Swift's early associations with Temple and Moor Park, it is greatly to be regretted that it is not now there, nor can Mrs. Johnston Foster, the present courteous owner, say when it was taken away, for after Mr. Bateman's death there was an intermediate proprietor of the place. This is an example of the way in which the links in the pedigrees of valuable heirlooms are lost, and of the difficulties met with by those who would trace them. Moor Park was, indeed, a natural home for a portrait of Swift, where he and Stella lived when both were young, where began their strange mysterious life romance, and which they left together to come to Ireland two hundred years ago.

(4) But perhaps the most pathetic interest graces the portrait, thirdly mentioned by Mason, the latest of all, painted by Bindon in 1740, when the great spirit was sinking through manifold decays of brain and body into the awful four years' lethargy, roused by fitful paroxysms, which closed the strange, eventful history. In April of that year Robert Nugent, afterwards created Viscount Clare and ultimately Earl Nugent, writes to Mrs. Whiteway, Swift's cousin, and then his nurse and amanuensis at the Deanery: "I shall say nothing of the picture, because I am sure you remember it; I must beg that you will let Mr. Bindon know I would have the picture no more than a head upon a three-quarter cloth to match one which I now have of Mr. Pope." Swift was now in the state indicated in Spenser's "Why dyest thou still and yet alive art found?" In the same

The Nugent

April he wrote in one of his very last letters : " But I am and have been these two days in so miserable a way and so cruelly tortured that can hardly be conceived ; the whole last night I was equally struck as if I had been in Phalaris's brazen bull, and roared as loud for eight or nine hours." This picture was afterwards sent to Nugent by one of the faithful few who did not desert the idol now that it was fallen from the pedestal. The picture was accompanied by verses of very considerable merit in Swift's metre and tenderest spirit, and has a high biographical value for the image it gives of the shattered genius whilst still alive.

From Bindon's colours you may trace
The patriot's venerable face,
The last, O Nugent, which his art
Shall ever to the world impart :
For know, the prime of mortal men,
That matchless monarch of the pen
(Whose labours, like the genial sun,
Shall through revolving ages run,
Yet never, like the sun, decline,
But in their full meridian shine)—
That ever-honoured, envied sage,
So long the wonder of his age,
Who charmed us with his golden strain
Is but the shadow of the Dean :
He only breathes Bœotian air—
' Oh! what a falling off was there ! '
Hibernia's Helicon is dry,
Invention, wit, and humour die ;
And what remains against the storm
Of malice but an empty form ?
The nodding ruins of a pile
That stood the bulwark of this Isle,
In which the sisterhood was fixed
Of candid honour, truth unmixed,
Imperial reason, thought profound,
And charity, diffusing round
In cheerful rivulets the flow
Of Fortune, to the sons of woe.

The poem, then, with scathing scorn, assails the supple train of those who had knelt round him so lately, but now had fled from the sinking ship. The poet was the Rev. William Dunkin, whose relations with the Dean explain the grateful fervour of the four last cited lines, and exemplify, perhaps, the most generous characteristic of Swift's multitudinous nature—his ceaseless bent towards helping struggling talent—which has not been enough dwelt on by his admirers, and has been ignored in the estimates of Jeffrey and Macaulay; and yet his recorded instances would take a long chapter in themselves. Dunkin, when a student in Trinity College, had translated into English verse Swift's Latin lyric on the Rocks of Carbery; his aunt had left her fortune to the University, which therefore voted him a small annuity. Swift wrote to the authorities a masterful letter in 1736 supporting a memorial urging, that though the condition in the will that her nephew should be granted a fellowship was absurd, this should be imputed to the old woman's ignorance; but that her intention was plain and should be duly regarded. He therefore urged that the annuity should be increased to £100 a year, and that Dunkin should have a promise of the next College living. The annuity was accordingly increased, and the Dean commended his protégé to the Archbishop of Cashel, who ordained him. Shortly after the living of Coleraine, which was in the gift of the London Company of Londonderry, fell vacant, and Swift wrote two urgent letters in 1738 to his friend Alderman Barber, one of the principal directors, demanding the post for Dunkin, who, he says, "is a gentleman of much wit, and the best English as well as Latin poet in this kingdom; . . . he is a pious, regular man, highly esteemed, but our bishops like yours, have little regard for such accomplishments while they have any dunces of nephews or cousins; I therefore charge you to use your influence." Barber tried to help, but did not succeed ; the Dean's friendship, however, survived his own life, for the graceful Lord Chesterfield, when Lord Lieutenant, appointed Dunkin head master of the Royal School of Enniskillen, the nurse of so many famous Irishmen. He became a Doctor of Divinity, and died in 1765, leaving two posthumously published volumes of poems, whose average is not equal to that from which we have quoted.

This Nugent picture got to Stowe thus : Nugent was a social celebrity and man about town ; Glover described him as "a jovial voluptuary, an Irishman who had left Popery for the Protestant religion" ; he had a strong Irish brogue to the last, but he could write a good English quatrain, if, as is said, this be his :

I loved thee beautiful and kind,
And plighted an eternal vow ;
So altered are thy face and mind
'Twere perjury to love thee now.

He became a popular and witty debater in the English House of Commons, and was made a member of his Ministry by the great Lord Chatham in his second administration. He was a favourite with ladies and married three ; first, a daughter of the Earl of Fingal ; secondly, the sister of Mr. Secretary Craggs, Addison's friend ; and thirdly, the Dowager Countess Berkeley ; their only child, Mary Elizabeth, succeeded her father as Baroness Nugent of Carlanstown in her own right, and married George Temple Nugent Grenville, created Marquess of Buckingham, and the picture thus came into the Buckingham Collection at Stowe, where was also a fine portrait of Nugent himself by Gainsborough. When this was scattered at the great Stowe sale in 1848, this portrait was purchased by Mr. W. Robertson, then of Hoe Place, Surrey, which has long since passed into other hands, and I have not yet been able to trace the picture further. The companion portrait of Pope, mentioned in the cited letter to Mrs. Whiteway, was also sold at the Stowe sale. Where, too, is this portrait, now thus clearly traced up to and beyond 1850? Mr. Robertson left Hoe Place some thirty-five years ago, and there is no trace or information about it at Hoe Place or Woking. The present editor, Mr. Temple Scott, advertised for it in "Notes and Queries" and in "The Athenæum," but without success. The companion portrait of Pope, also mentioned in Nugent's letter, appeared beside it at Stowe, and was also purchased for Mr. Robertson; perhaps this notice of it may now lead towards its discovery.

(5) But there is a very remarkable and valuable portrait in the possession of the Earl of Drogheda at Moore Abbey, which was exhibited in the spring of 1903 at the fine Loan Collection in the Hibernian Academy, and strikingly coincides with what we know of the Nugent Bindon and the condition of Swift in 1740. It is "the head on a three-quarters cloth," mentioned in Nugent's letter, and the snowy locks fall to each side over the shoulders. Lady Drogheda most courteously gave me a photograph, with permission to use it for the present edition.

The Moore Abbey
Swift.

It is a most pathetic face, seemingly a few years older than those of the Bindons of 1735-6. The white hair falls from beneath a crimson skull-cap covering the baldness at the top, marking the period when he was a confirmed invalid, and had laid aside the periwig he had for thirty years habitually worn within doors and without. All points the date to be not earlier than 1739, when he had ceased to visit or to receive any save old and habitual friends, or to discharge any public functions, and when his voluminous correspondence had shrunk to nine letters in his own hand, the rest being carried on through his cousin and home guardian, Martha Whiteway. We may observe en passant that of the nine letters two were his last letters to Pope, two were to Alderman Barber, one to Mrs. Whiteway, and one to Faulkner, in the last of which he says: "My memory is quite gone;" and five of them are to advocate the interests of his protégés, including his relatives, Deane and William Swift, and Dunkin. In 1740, of only six letters five are to Martha Whiteway, and in the following year a writ of Lunatico inquirendo issued from the Court of Chancery. The Moore Abbey records do not tell where or when this portrait was obtained. It has been said by some to be by Slaughter, who certainly was a contemporary artist of some eminence, and the expression and features are certainly painted with higher artistic skill than the Bindons of 1735 exhibit, for which reason an eminent expert of our time believes that it is not by the same hand. But I can find no trace of Slaughter having ever painted the Dean, or having been even known to him, no mention of his name appearing in all the Swift literature, so rich in allusion to the personages of his day, whilst the Dean's condition at the time of this portrait make it in the highest degree improbable that he should have sat to a stranger then. On the other hand, we know that Bindon, who was an intimate of old standing, did paint him in that year, 1739, for Nugent, who only received the portrait in 1740, and the question would probably be solved if the Nugent Bindon were now forthcoming. My surmise is that the Moore Abbey portrait is a duplicate of it, and the engraving which now appears in this volume may contribute to a true identification.

- (6) These inferences since they were written have been somewhat confirmed. It was thought at The Swiftsheath Bindon. Moore Abbey that the portrait there was the only one known with the crimson skull-cap. Swiftsheath, county Kilkenny, is the ancient home of the Irish branch of the Swift family. Its first owner was the great Dean's uncle Godwin. The dining room there I have lately been permitted to examine by the kindness of its present owner, Mr. Godwin Swift, D.L., the lineal descendant of the first proprietor. It is replete with memorials of the Dean and the family, which I hope may justify the notice I append to this paper, for it might be called a gallery of illustration to the memorable autobiographic tract written by the Dean about the year 1727. Here has hung his portrait ever since his own times, and it has immemorially been attributed to Francis Bindon by the family. It is identical with the crimson-capped Swift at Moore Abbey. The pathos of the countenance is much enhanced in these surroundings, in the place where he spent his holidays in his boyhood, and whence he was sent to and maintained in Kilkenny College School by his Uncle Godwin till the time when he entered the Dublin University. No suggestion has ever been made at Swiftsheath that this picture was by Slaughter, and pending further light I meanwhile venture to class both these portraits as Bindons.

(7) The fourth Bindon, mentioned by Monck Mason as a three-quarter-length portrait in Mr. Berwick's possession, is that of which a photogravure copy appears as the frontispiece in the third volume of this edition of Swift's works. It is almost certainly an artist's replica of the Howth portrait, and as certainly it is not a mere copy. The accessories of the genius of Erin, the writhing Wood and the Temple of Fame, are omitted, and in the dark of the neutral background there is merely a shadowed Apollo with the lyre: but the attitude, the angle of aspect, the pose of the head and contour of the whole person in both portraits are alike. The right hand in this portrait grasps the scroll, but the forefinger more clearly points to the legend upon it: "The Drapier's Fourth Letter to the whole people of Ireland," as with the fingers of the left hand he partly unrolls the paper. The arms and hands also are lowered considerably below the slightly open waistcoat, and the scroll is larger than in the Howth prototype, seemingly to suit the change from a full length with accessories, to a three-quarter length without them. This portrait is now held in trust by my co-trustee, Mr. Walter Berwick, and myself; it has been for a hundred years in the possession of the Berwick family traditionally handed down as an original Bindon, and as such was, with that of Stella hereafter mentioned, lent to the Exhibition at South Kensington in 1867, by the late Judge Berwick. As to this portrait and its cotemporary at Howth, it is remarkable that Swift in his later days, and thinking, as we know he then was, of the times that were to succeed him, for he was then planning his Asylum for the Insane, should select for posterity as his personifying composition his notorious "Fourth Drapier," that in which he had proclaimed the imperial independence of Ireland, and for which he and his printer Harding had been in jeopardy ten years before. This portrait was exhibited at the Cork Exhibition of 1902. It is in a state of perfect preservation.

(8) Since the above was written my attention has been called by Mr. Strickland, the courteous Secretary of the Irish National Portrait Gallery, to a portrait by Bindon lately in the possession of Colonel Brereton, of Kilcullen, Co. Meath, of which Mr. Strickland has given me a photograph. It is almost identical with our Berwick Bindon just mentioned, which is the frontispiece of the third volume of this edition, save that the lineaments of the features are not so marked, which makes the countenance less haughty and more amiable. In the right background an open country with a gray horse takes the place of the classic statue, but the chief interest lies in the inscription on the scroll, where, instead of the "Fourth Drapier's Letter," we read "Travels by Lemuel Gulliver—A Voyage to the Country of the Houyhnhnms. F. Bindon arm 1737." This is the sole portrait on which the artist's name appears on the canvas, thus, whilst attesting its genuineness, confirming our inference that Bindon, like Jervas, made several replicas. Colonel Brereton got this portrait in 1847 from his father-in-law, Mr. Paul Barry, an old resident of Dublin, who prized it as a traditional original Bindon. It was sold in 1904 in Messrs. Bennett's Sale Rooms in Dublin, and purchased by the family of Mr. Swift MacNeill, M.P., who are also descendants of the Dean's uncle Godwin, of Swiftsheath.

(9) A very excellent likeness of Swift was in 1904 on exhibition in the Irish National Portrait Gallery, lent by Miss Curtis of Portlaw, co. Waterford, to Dr. Hill's Bindon (?) whom it descended from her great-grandfather, Dr. Edward Hill, an eminent physician in Dublin in the earlier years of the last century. It has been traditionally attributed to Bindon. Interesting in itself, it is more so for the controversy long existing concerning it, and which we venture to think we at last can solve. It is painted on paper carefully laid on a small oak panel, in an oval some 13 by 9 inches, not in oils, but in pastel and water-colour. Of this Sir Walter Scott (1814) says: "Another portrait, supposed to be one of the best likenesses in existence, and also painted by Bindon, is the property of Dr. Hill of Dublin. The expression of the features differs in some respects from the picture in the Deanery, being rather of a deep and melancholy cast than of the stern, harsh, and imperative character." On this Monck Mason (1819) remarks:¹ "There is a small portrait of Swift, done in crayons, if I recollect right, in the possession of Dr. Hill, of Dublin; Mr. Scott says it was executed by Bindon, but I apprehend he is mistaken, as Bindon did not work with those materials." Nor did Bindon ever work with the artistic finish, delicacy, and precision which this portrait displays in the sparkle of the eyes, in the deep black eyebrows, in the contours of the double chin and careful curling of the periwig, all of which point to its execution by a skilful miniature painter. But it is equally clear that the artist had before him one of the genuine Bindons above mentioned, thus sufficiently accounting for its attribution to him; and, supported by the opinion of my friend Mr. Strickland, I conclude that this portrait is the work of young Rupert Barber, done at the time when he sketched in crayons the wigless portrait afterwards engraved for Lord Orrery's book, and hereafter referred to when treating of the engravings of the Dean. With this portrait Miss Curtis sent the original grant of the Freedom of the City by the Dublin Corporation presented to Swift in a gold box, and of which he was mightily proud. The grant emblazons the Swift arms in an impaled shield, the three stags in full course in the sinister with a mediaeval full-length of St. Patrick himself in the dexter. For Dr. Hill was an ardent Swiftian; Sir Walter Scott in his Memoir of Swift thanks him for the gift of an engraving of one of Wood's halfpence, which Scott prefixed to Section V., and which he vindicates as remarkably handsome and proved by Sir Isaac Newton, when Master of the Mint, to be equal in all things to the same denomination in England; but Swift's furious satire would have doomed them as base coin had they been pure gold.

Note. In Lady Cork's lately published "Orrery Papers" appears, in the second volume, an engraving there said to be of Dean Swift, from a portrait in the possession of the Earl of Cork at Marston. The face is handsome and the forehead is high and retreating like Swift's, but the other features and expression are not even like him or any of his known portraits; but that it is not a portrait of the Dean is absolutely proved by the portrait itself on even a slight examination, for his robes are not those of a clergyman at all, but of a Lord Chancellor or dignitary wearing similar judicial robes. It ought not to be difficult to identify this portrait, for it is an excellent one, but I have not been able to obtain a clue to its original.

FRANCIS BINDON

Francis Bindon was a cadet of a good old Anglo-Irish family in the county of Limerick represented there up to our day. Though probably never out of Ireland, he won a high insular reputation, as in the ode to Mr. Pecksniff, "The Architect, Artist and Man." Mr. Deane Swift, who was much with his cousin the Dean in his last days, speaks of Bindon thus: "One of the greatest painters and architects of his time."¹ On account of his age and some little failure of his sight he threw aside his pencil soon after the year 1750 and afterwards lived to a good old age, greatly beloved and respected by all who had the happiness either of his friendship or acquaintance. He died June 2, 1765.² His merit as an architect is still attested by Russborough in the county Wicklow, designed by him for Joseph Leeson, the first Lord Russborough and Earl of Milltown; and Bessborough in the county Kilkenny, built for the first Earl of that name. At Bessborough there has long been a portrait inscribed as the founder of the house, which was therefore supposed to

² His death is thus announced in Faulkner's "Dublin Journal," of Tues., June 4, to Sat., June 8, 1765:

"Died suddenly on Sunday last, in his Chariot, in his way to the country, Francis Bindon, Esq., one of the best Painters and Architects this Nation ever produced. He was a most Polite, well-bred Gentleman, and an Excellent Scholar, which he improved by his Travels abroad. His fine Paintings and Architecture will remain a lasting Monument to his Memory. Witness the Portraits of the famous Dean Swift in the Deanery House of St. Patrick's, Dublin; Lord Howth's country seat, two others of that great Genius, in another House in different Draperies. There are also two full Portraits of his Painting in the University of Dublin, of Dr. Baldwin, late Provost, and of Dr. Boulter, Primate of All Ireland, in the Workhouse of Dublin. Some Houses of his Designs are those of Lord Bessborough, Mount Morres, and Sir William Fownes, in the county of Kilkenny, and Milltown's in the county of Wicklow."

represent one of the ancestors of the Ponsonby family, but it has been ascertained to be that of the artist himself, the designer, and in this sense, founder of the house. Beside his portraits of Swift he painted those of many distinguished cotemporaries: that of Lionel, Duke of Dorset, when Lord Lieutenant in 1734; of Hugh Boulter, the Primate 1724-1742; of Cobbe, Archbishop of Dublin; and of Lord Chief Justice Singleton, of the Irish Common Pleas, who was Swift's dear friend when Serjeant-at-Law.

BUSTS OF SWIFT

When the old sick lion at last lay dead, and when to think of him, as Thackeray has finely said, was "like thinking of the ruins of a great empire," he was laid out in state in the hall of his deanery house, and the Dublin crowds were permitted to enter, and say farewell. An eye-witness tells how his coffin was open, he had on his head neither cap nor wig, there was not much hair on the front or very top, but it was long and thick behind, very white, and was like flax on the pillow. Mrs. Barnard, his nurse-tender, sat at his head, but, having occasion to leave the room for a short time, some one cut a lock of hair from his head, which she missed on her return, and after that day no one was admitted to see him.¹ This Rape of the Lock is almost forgiveable, for all Dublin was seeking such relics.

Yea, beg a hair of him for memory,
And, dying, mention it within their wills,
Bequeathing it, as a rich legacy,
Unto their issue.

And yet, to adapt his own inscription of poor Stella's tress, it was—"Only an old man's hair!"

But whilst he thus lay a plaster cast was taken of his head and face, which for years was to be seen in the museum of ¹ Monck Mason's "History of St. Patrick's," p. 412.

Trinity College, until some sixty or seventy years ago it was accidentally destroyed. From this a bust was manufactured—"manufactured," because Sir William Wilde, who carefully examined it with the cast and with the skull of the Dean, exhumed in 1835, conclusively shows that in forming this bust all the posterior parts of the cerebellum are fictitious, the plaster rasped down according to the eye of the artist.¹ In Wilde's volume there is an interesting engraving of the right profile of this bust which alone is perfect, and which shows the junction of the mask with the posterior of the head. This bust has given rise to some keen literary controversy. Sir Walter, in 1814, apparently speaking of it as he saw it himself, says: "The expression of countenance is most unequivocally maniacal, and one side of the mouth, the left, horribly contorted downwards as if convulsed by pain. It is engraved for Mr. Barrett's Essay." This judgement is rather irefully challenged by Monck Mason in 1819, who asserts that the expression in the original bust is not in the slightest degree maniacal, but "the most placid and the most free from any turbulent expression that can be imagined," and he says Scott must have taken his impression not from the bust itself, but from the engraving in Dr. Nichols's edition of Sheridan's "Swift," which Mason here alleges was taken from the cast, adding that it is a vile representation. Then Sir W. Wilde, in 1848, queries Mason's assertion that Nichols's engraving is taken from the cast, as he says there is no evidence of this. But I venture to think that Monck Mason was right, and I had formed the same opinion before I had noticed the dispute. The new edition of Dr. Nichols's first volume, in which the engraving appears, came out in 1808. In the preface he says he is indebted to the kind interference of Mr. Malone for the annexed portrait of the Dean engraved from a drawing of him taken immediately after his death. But whilst there is no evidence or tradition other than this of a post-mortem drawing, the intrinsic testimony of the engraving itself seems to negative that it was taken from a drawing—there is no suggestion of the snowy locks which flowed mane-like over the dead lion's neck, and which no artist would ever have omitted, above all when all the world around was urgent for one of them: the head in the engraving is almost bald or just as it would appear if copied from a bust. This seems to me to be almost conclusive. Shakesperian Edmund Malone was doubtless one of the surest channels of Swiftian traditions, for he was born in Dublin when Swift was still alive, and was himself still living when Nichols wrote, but few are the traditions that less deviate from the absolute than one recording an engraving as made from a drawing taken after death, which was in truth from a cast so taken, of which latter the evidence is absolute indeed. Monck Mason's conjecture also that Sir Walter judged from this engraving and not from the bust itself has some confirmation in this, that Sir Walter adds that the bust is engraved for Mr. Barrett's essay. Now no such engraving appears in this essay as first published in that same year, 1808, but this mistake, if it be one, can, I think, be easily accounted for. The very learned but very eccentric Dr. John Barrett, Vice-Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, had a few years previously composed his "Essay on the Earlier Part of the Life of Jonathan Swift," taken largely from the College records of Swift's undergraduate years, but it remained unpublished until 1808, when Nichols's edition appeared, the prefatory advertisement of which states that when their work was nearly ready for the press the proprietors were favoured, through the friendly exertions of Mr. Malone, with the Vice-Provost's valuable essay. This is incorporated accordingly in the first volume, with which the same proprietors published separately and nearly simultaneously the Essay itself. The engraving is, however, inserted immediately in front of the copy of the Essay printed in Nichols' edition, but whilst this, in a manner, may justify Sir Walter's statement, it seems to show that he spoke from things orally told him in Dublin when he came there shortly afterwards, and that he saw this engraving and was told that it was copied from the bust, as Mason unequivocally states it was when writing in Dublin only six years after Scott had published. I may add that Sir Henry Craik also regards Nichols's engraving as taken from the cast or bust. "Another portrait," he says, "is one taken from a cast after death when the placidity, which we are told by Mrs. Pendarves belonged to his appearance in the second infancy of his old age, had passed away and there remained only the distorted wreck that partial paralysis preceding death had left." The bust itself is to-day in the new anatomical museum of Trinity College, in its Golgotha or Place of Skulls, where, by the kindness of Professor Dixon, Professor of Anatomy to the University, I have inspected it, the Professor kindly examining it with me. It was curious to see how in a few minutes he formed precisely the same conclusions as to its manufacture at which Wilde had arrived sixty years before. The face, however, I would think, deserves neither to be called "placid" with Monck Mason, nor "contorted" with Scott or Craik; the expression is rather that of senility in death. The full deep lips have shrunk and sunk in, probably from the loss of the teeth, and are like those of an octogenarian. The muscles between cheek and mouth are more contracted on one side than the other, which both to Wilde and Professor Dixon prove a partial facial paralysis, but "contortion" is much too strong a term, for the lip corners that turned upwards so saucily in his prime are drawn downwards now equally on both sides, as of one who had long lived in deep melancholy or chronic despair.

But besides the ghastly denizen of an anatomical museum there are six marble busts of Swift specified by Sir W. Wilde as existing in Dublin in 1846. Of these two are accessible to all, and each has some literary connexion.

The Roubiliac
Bust.

In the great hall of the library of Trinity College, Dublin, range thirty-six marble busts of the more or less illustrious, most of them distinguished sons of Alma Mater, each on a pedestal in the pillared spaces between the successive book-stand bays. Here, third to the right from the entrance, is the splendid head of Swift by Roubiliac: Whiteside is next to him, Goldsmith right opposite, his old friend Dr. Delany of Delville near, with Usher, Edmund Burke, and Parnell, another old friend, not far removed. This bust is worthy of subject and sculptor, modelled manifestly from the Jervas portraits, brilliant in expression like these, the forehead crowned with a garland of bays. It forms the frontispiece of Vol. x. of this edition. It was presented to the Library by the Senior Sophisters of 1738. This, the fourth, or final class of undergraduates, then habitually celebrated their approaching freedom by a festival, but in this year Sampson was now shorn of his strength, and gown and town could not hope often to see again their hero in the life. So the Sophisters forwent their festival. The story is recorded in Faulkner's "Dublin Journal" for 25th March, 1749. "There is arrived from London a marble busto of the late Rev. Dr. Swift, D.D., D.S.P.D., the workmanship of Mr. Ruzilliac (sic). It is done with exquisite skill and delicacy, and is looked upon by persons of taste as a masterpiece. It deserves to be mentioned that the class of senior sophisters, who, according to academical custom, formed themselves into a senate in the year 1738, applied the money usually laid out in an entertainment to the purchase of this busto, which they have given to be placed in the College Library among the heads of other men eminent for genius and learning, an instance of public spirit in young persons worthy of praise and imitation:

VERSES PROPOSED AS AN INSCRIPTION.

We youth of Alma,—thee her pride and grace,
 Illustrious Swift, amid these heroes place ;—
 Thee, of such high associates worthiest found,
 In genius, fancy, sense alike renowned.
 Rich in unborrowed wit thy various page
 By turns displays the patriot, poet, sage,
 Born to delight thy country and defend,
 In life, in death to human race a friend.
 For mad and idiots—whom alone to teach
 Thy writings fail—thy will's last bounty reach.
 All hail Hibernia's boast ! our other pride—
 Late, very late, may Berkeley grace thy side."

The final aspiration in these mediocre lines has been so far fulfilled that Berkeley's bust has not yet been added to the Walhalla. Their best inspiration is obviously from the Dean's famous "Verses on his own Death"; the "unborrowed wit" is borrowed from:

To steal a hint was never known,
 But what he writ was all his own.

And the allusion to Swift's Hospital from,

He gave the little wealth he had
 To build a house for fools and mad,
 And show'd by one satiric touch
 No nation wanted it so much.

The other public bust is even more world-famous, looking down from beside the Swift monument in his own Cathedral of St. Patrick's in the south aisle to the right of the south-western entrance. For many years it had been perched so high that the features could not be fairly seen, but Dean Bernard has very judiciously had it lately moved down to nearer the eye-line, not the least of his praiseworthy improvements. This was the work of an Irish artist, Patrick Cunningham, and was probably executed for Faulkner, his fantastic publisher, in the seventeenth volume of whose edition of Swift's works, 1768, it is rather fairly engraved, inscribed, "from the original in the possession of George Faulkner." The face seems somewhat older than in the Jervas portraits, but the dimpled chin and bantering mouth are there. Lord Macaulay, perhaps not here the most competent judge, says, that "it is considered much the best likeness of the Dean, striking and full of character." It was presented to the Dean and Chapter in 1776 by Thomas Todd Faulkner, the nephew of the publisher, in whose lifetime it had been the ornament of his bookshop in Parliament Street, where it stood in a bow window looking towards Essex Bridge from a bracket which remained till towards the end of the century.¹ Here Faulkner would show it to his customers. John O'Keefe tells how one day he was passing and saw Faulkner standing at his door, and as he stared in at the bust, which was then upon the counter, Faulkner, inferring from a portfolio under his arm that he was a pupil at the Royal Academy, invited him in. He turned the bust around, saying it was the head of his friend and patron Dean Swift. Then he took him upstairs and showed him his portrait of the Dean.² Faulkner kept this bust during his life. Yet notwithstanding his hero worship he undertook the publishing of Orrery's shabby "Remarks" only to bring discredit on himself. The public feeling in Dublin taking revenge in the following epigram:

Faulkner for once you have some judgment shown,
In representing Swift transformed to stone,
For could he thy ingratitude have known,
Astonishment itself the work had done.

¹ Gilbert, "History of the City of Dublin," vol. ii., p. 52.

² This is the great full-length Swift in the theatre of Trinity College, but it is a copy of the Deanery portrait he had executed for himself after the Dean's death, and which subsequently to his own was presented to the University of Dublin.

A third of the six mentioned by Wilde is that now in the Irish National Portrait Gallery, for which it was purchased in 1899 on the death of its owner, Mrs. Ruthven, the daughter of Dr. Crampton who owned it in 1846 when Wilde wrote. The latter says it is by Van Nost, though there is a tradition in the family that it was by Cunningham. A close examination of this bust would, however, show that it could not have been by Cunningham, but that it is most probably a post-mortem composition by Van Nost, who first came to Ireland in 1750. Inspecting it carefully with Mr. Strickland shortly since, we could clearly detect the traces of the facial paralysis so marked in the post-mortem bust in the Museum; the flesh muscle forming the lower rim of the right eye is painfully dragged down, corresponding with the partial distortion of the mouth, and it is quite unlikely that an artist would or could have thus portrayed him in his lifetime, whereas Van Nost came to Dublin when he was dead five years.

Van Nost's Bust in
the National Portrait Gallery, Dublin.

This criticism is confirmed by a fourth of Wilde's busts, which when he wrote was owned by Mr. Watkins, a Dublin picture dealer, and which he says bears clear evidence of the facial paralysis, and which I believe is surely identical with that in the possession of Mr. Pierce Finucane of Pembroke Road, Dublin, who purchased it at the sale of the late Lord James Butler's interesting collection a few years ago. It seems to be a replica or duplicate of the Van Nost bust. Both have the occiput straight, which suggests a further inference, that it was composed some time after the Dean's death. The fifth bust, Wilde states, was at Charlemont House in Rutland Square in 1846. This I have been unable hitherto to trace, for Lord Charlemont's mansion has long been the public office of the Registrar General for Ireland, and its many treasures have long since been dispersed. The sixth in Wilde's time belonged to Godwin Swift, Esq., which he says was by Cunningham, and if so was probably a duplicate of the bust in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

THE ENGRAVINGS OF SWIFT

Of these we have already mentioned those from the Jervas portraits by Vertue, Fourdrinier, and the two Noble's List of Engravings. by Miller from Bindon, with that engraved for Lord Orrery's Essay and that published by Nichols. In Noble's "Continuation of Granger's Biographical History of England," a list of engravings of Swift is given, which is as follows:

Jonathan Swift, 12mo., A. Bannerman, sc.

Jonathan Swift, 12mo., J. Basine, sc., 1774.

Jonathan Swift, mez., Markham, p., Burford, sc., 1744.

Jonathan Swift sitting in a nightgown holding a pen, fol., C. Jervas, p., P. Fourdrinier, sc.

Jonathan Swift sitting holding a book, mez., Markham, p., V. Haecken, sc., 1741.

Jonathan Swift, wh. length, mez., F. Bindon, p., 1739, A. Miller, sc., 1743.

Jonathan Swift, oval frame, canonical habit, 12 verses, mez., P. Pelham, sc.

Jonathan Swift sitting, "Exegi Monumentum aere perennius," Vertue, sc.

Jonathan Swift, oval frame, wig, canonical habit, la. fol., Vertue, sc.

Jonathan Swift, 8vo., Vertue, sc.

Jonathan Swift, profile, prefixed to his life by Lord Orrery, 12mo., B. Wilson, sc., 1751. This is taken from a profile in crayons by Mr. Barber which belonged to Dr. Mead.

Some of the above were engraved long after Swift's death, and are scarce worth further tracing. Those ascribed to Markham, however, engraved by Van Haecken and Burford, need some notice. There is an excellent specimen of the former in the Dublin National Portrait Gallery; my late antiquarian friend, Rev. Wm. Reynell, gave me a good copy of the second. This is inscribed: "Markham ad vivum delin. Burford fecit 1744." They are nearly identical as portraits, but nothing seems clearer than that neither was taken ad vivum, but that they are manifestly copied from one of Bindon's portraits. The set of the periwig to the brow, the pose of the bands to the double chin, the opening in the waistcoat so peculiar to the Bindon portraits, and shown in Miller's mezzotints, are servilely reproduced in these Markhams, and although he seats the Dean in an armchair with a book in his right hand, the upturned wristbands and the hands and position of the fingers are taken ad vivum from Bindon. The real difference is in the lineaments, which represent an amiable old gentleman, the haughty tragic lines being quite lost which give the chief historic value to the Bindon portraiture. And it is most unlikely that Markham ever painted the Dean, though Noble's list writes "p" (pinxit) after Markham's name; the engravings have the doubtful word "delin" (or delineavit) which is even more applicable to a sketch or drawing than to a work in oils. A careful search has failed to ascertain the existence of any Markham a painter, and we account for these two made-up engravings by the great call for Swift's likeness after he disappeared in lunacy, a call which the existing portraits and engravings were unable to satisfy. Chaloner Smith states in the Catalogue of Mezzotints that the second of these engravings was formed by a mutilation of the earlier plate. Burford's name being substituted for Van Haecken, was further evidence of the manufacture. It may be added that Van Haecken was, as far as we know, never in Ireland.

The seventh in Noble's list, attributed to P. Pelham, is also noteworthy for its supreme audacity in the history of engravings, which can only be accounted for by the popular craving for likenesses of Swift, and the shifts to which engravers were driven to gratify the demand. The Rev. Benjamin Pratt was Provost of Trinity College in William III.'s time; he died Dean of Down in 1721. An engraving of this dignitary was executed by J. Simon. This fell into the hands of the Philistines: the face was turned round to look to the left; for the inscription "J. Simon, fecit," "P. Pelham" was substituted with "J. Bowles, excud.," and the whole was boldly inscribed: "Jonathan Swift, S.T.D., Dean of the Cathedral Church of St. Patrick's, Dublin," with twelve glorifying lines on the Drapier's letters and the genius who turns brass half-pence into standard gold. And yet these daring coiners seem to have imposed their brass half-pence for standard gold not merely on the public but even on Mr. Noble, who made the above catalogue. And, strange to say, this is not the only instance of such base coin. Mr. Strickland has lately informed me of a similar specimen. James MacArdell engraved in mezzotint a portrait of Dr. Thomas Birch, after J. Wills. Dr. Birch died in 1766. The fourth state of the plate has the name "Dr. Birch" erased and "Dean Swift" boldly substituted.

The last enumerated in Noble's list is that engraved for the frontispiece of Lord Orrery's famous (some think them infamous) "Remarks," published by George Faulkner in 1751, just six years after Swift's death. It is inscribed "B. Wilson, fecit," without other indication whence it came. And if we knew no more of it one might surmise that it was spitefully selected by the spiteful author for his disparaging essay as his ideal of the lion dead, whom he was so ready to attend as a literary jackal when alive, sure if provoked to suppress him for ever with a growl, for this noble author had at hand the fine engravings of Vertue, Miller and Fourdrinier, to say nothing of the great portraits at the deanery or Howth Castle. Of this engraving Sir Henry Craik eloquently says that it represents the Dean "in his later days, just before he entered on the dark valley that for him preceded death. In it we see the anguish, the loneliness, the despair of one who sounded depths in human nature that he feels would have been better unexplored, and who stands gazing, as it were, into a future which is overcast by dread of coming ill."

But it is fair to say that the coarseness and the gloom of this poor phantom may be attributable rather to the wretched art of the engraver than to the author's malice prepense. In the list of the engraved portraits of Swift which we have printed above, this Orrery likeness is enumerated last, with a note "taken from a profile in crayons by Mr. Barber, which belonged to Dr. Mead." Now this original crayon is still in the possession of Mr. Le Fanu, of Dublin Castle, to whom it came from his uncle, Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu, the novelist.¹ The family are lineally descended from Tom Sheridan, Richard Brinsley Sheridan's father, and his father, Thomas Sheridan, Swift's brilliant partner in puns and pasquinades. Mr. Le Fanu has very kindly given me a photograph of the crayon, which is neither coarse, nor despairing, nor blurred. It is a fine, clean-cut sketch, apparently intended for a bust, for the throat and neck are bare, rising above the slight classic drapery, and this accounts for the disuse of the full-bottomed wig. The names, Mr. Barber and Dr. Mead, indicate its origin, and their relations with each other and with Swift throw light not only on this profile, but on the Barber-Bindon crayon described above. Mead was one of his intimates in the Queen Anne days, and was one of the Court physicians at the Queen's deathbed, the only one bold enough to say she was dying, for Arbuthnot thought or said the case was not desperate. They had sent for the great Radcliffe, who said he was ill, and would not come;

for which he incurred a vote of censure from the House of Commons; and he wrote to Mead that he was in danger of being torn to pieces by the London mob.

Richard Mead was one of the most eminent of the eminent of his day, and only escaped being great for all time. Dr. Johnson says, "he lived more in the broad sunshine of life than almost any man." Greatest in his profession, he was Court physician to the first two Georges, the intimate and correspondent of the famous Dutchman, Boerhaave. But he was great also as a natural philosopher, a classical scholar and a literary savant, the intimate and correspondent of Newton and of Bentley. In his home in Great Ormond Street, now the Hospital for Children, he had the best private library and one of the best art and virtu collections in London. Of these Dibdin says: "The ever-renowned Dr. Mead, whose pharmaceutical reputation is lost in the blaze of his bibliomaniacal glory." He was most generous and brave, in his great practice attending poor patients gratis, and when the all-powerful Walpole imprisoned his friend Dr. Freind for political reasons, being then himself in Mead's hands, Mead set him free by refusing to attend the Prime Minister until he was released, thus following the precedent of Louis XI and his Court physician. And when Watteau came to London, poor and ill, Mead attended him freely, but the grateful artist sent him afterwards two paintings of his own, which at present values would be indeed a magnificent fee. Mrs. Mary Barber, Swift's poetess protégée, the wife of a Dublin draper, went to London under his patronage, commended to his friends there as another Sappho; Mead took her under his wing. In November, 1736, she writes to Swift with effusive gratitude from Bath; she tells him her son is learning to paint, with very good prospects, and that Dr. Mead, whose goodness to her is great, may be of vast use to him if he finds he is worthy of his favour. He was successful. Faulkner, in a note on this letter in 1767, says:¹ "Mr. Rupert Barber, a most eminent painter in crayons and miniature." Young Barber afterwards came to Dublin and joined the Swiftian circle at Dr. Patrick Delany's. In one of his latest verses to Delany, Swift rallying him pro more on his costly adornment at Delville, mentioned below in the notice of the Stella portraits, he says:

Jonathan Swift.

Here a convenient box you found
Which you demolished to the ground.
Then built, then took up with your arbour,
And set the house to Rupert Barber.

* * * *

You change a circle to a square
Then to a circle as you were.
Who can imagine whence the fund is
That you quadrata change rotundis?

Thus we have Barber in Dublin in the Dean's failing days sketching his now almost bald head in crayons, and so confirming Sir Henry Craik's judgement that the period of this sketch was when Swift was at the entrance to the valley of the shadow. And thus, too, we can account for Dr. Hill's crayon portrait, painted by Barber from one of the original Bindons, probably that in the Deanery.

In 1737 Swift sent Mead a present of his works, and in a letter from Alderman Barber (he was no relative of the poetess) to the Dean,² he tells him "Dr. Mead is proud of your compliments, and returns his thanks and service." Mead's monument in the north aisle of the nave in Westminster Abbey has a fine bust and an inscription which gives an interesting emphasis to the Dean's presentation copy of his works. It styles him Archiatus, or chief physician, and recounting his literary attainments, adds, "Bibliothecam lectissimam optimis et rarissimis libris . . . comparavit," in which we may surmise that he esteemed his "Gulliver" and "Tale of a Tub" as amongst at least the most original of its contents. In the few months before and after his death Mead's library and art collections were sold in London, and fetched the then great figure of £16,000. There is an octavo copy of the catalogue of the sale in the British Museum. We may presume it was then the Barber sketch came back to Ireland.

From this review of his portraits it must be admitted that Swift left behind him no really great likeness in the artistic sense. His day was too late or too soon for this. He just escaped sitting to Kneller. The journal to Stella in October, 1710, tells how his friends, Congreve the poet and Delaval, had begged Sir Godfrey "to paint him for nothing," and how the artist wrote entreating Swift to sit to him, but "I know not yet when I shall sit."¹ Nothing more is heard of the project. Perhaps Kneller didn't care to renew the offer, learning that he was at the same time sitting to Jervas, and his own day, as we have seen, was then waning. Then it was in the generation after him that the splendid constellation of English portrait artists, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, and Hoppner rose above the horizon. But we may sorely lament that he was not sent down to us by Hogarth, who had just taken to portrait painting when Swift published "Gulliver" and visited London for the last time in 1726. Kindred spirits they were in many things, for the author of "The Houyhnhnms" and the painter of "Marriage à la Mode" and the "Harlot's Progress" saw the humanity that passed on the stage before and around them in similar ghastly and awful lights. Exuberant in genius, neither was an artist in the higher and angelic sense, having the "vision and the faculty divine," and the biographer of each might, perhaps, not inaptly call Hogarth the Swift of the painters, and Swift the Hogarth of the poets.

SWIFTSHEATH

SWIFT'S autobiographical tract was first published and edited by his cousin Deane in his essay of 1755, under the title of "The Family of Swift." He lodged the Dean's manuscript in Trinity College, in the library of which it still lies. Swiftsheath is a fine old mansion and demesne on the Nore, near where Spenser saw it—"The Stubborne Newre, whose waters gray by faire Kilkenny and Rosseponte boord." The Dean's tract begins with a statement that the Swifts were ancient in Yorkshire, and from them descended a noted person under the name of Cavaliero Swift, a man of wit and humour, of whom many traditional pleasant stories are related which the family planted in Ireland hath received from their parents. He was created Lord Carlingford. And in the next section he says there was another of the same family, Sir Edward Swift, well known in the times of the great rebellion and usurpation. The portraits of both these, the Cavaliero and Sir Edward, are conspicuous in the Swiftsheath dining room, declared cavaliers both, with ruffles and lace and twisted moustaches. They were half-brothers, sons of Sir Robert Swift of Rotheram, Yorkshire. Sir Edward, the elder, was knighted by James I., and married the sister of Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, but died without posterity. The younger 'Cavaliero' was Barnham Swift, created Viscount Carlingford in Ireland in 1627, though, as the Dean says, he was never in that kingdom. He took his name Barnham from his mother Ursula, cousin german of the great Francis Bacon. A new interest has lately been given to these two royalist portraits. "Cavaliero" Barnham died without issue male; but he had married Lady Mary Crichton, sister of the Earl of Dumfries, and his own sister Penelope became the wife of that earl. This Dumfries peerage having merged in that of the Marquis of Bute, the late Lord Bute a few years ago wrote to Mr. Swift of Swiftsheath, inquiring after the portraits of the two cavaliers who had thus become figures in his own pedigree. Mr. Swift sent them to Lord Bute, who had copies taken before they were remitted to the Swiftsheath walls. The Dean is somewhat uncertain as to these Yorkshire kinsmen. He says that Cavaliero Barnham's heiress, whether of the first or second descent, was married to Robert Fielding, commonly called the handsome Fielding, and that the Earl of Eglinton married another co-heiress of the family. He is nearly correct, however. The daughter of the Earl of Dumfries and Penelope, Cavaliero's sister, married Alexander, eighth Earl of Eglinton, and it was his own daughter, Mary Swift, who became the wife of the profligate Beau.

Then there is a portrait in episcopal lawn of Bishop Godwin, of Bath, who was the Dean's great-great-grandfather, for his daughter was the mother of the Rev. William Swift, of Canterbury, presently described. Through him the pre-nomen of Godwin has been hereditary with the Swifts for many generations.

There hangs close beside the Dean's own portrait, as he would wish to have it, one not indeed of a Swift, but of one of his prime lady favourites, the once beautiful and popular Mary Granville, who, as Mrs. Pendarves, was the charming correspondent of the Dean in his later years. During his last illness she married his intimate friend, Dr. Delany, whom she long survived. Her small picture here is of an elderly widow; the traces of beauty are gone, but the plump, rosy countenance is full of animation, and the broad forehead beneath the great widow's cap betokens the active talent which dictated the six large volumes of "Autobiography," which are still standard authorities to illustrate the persons and the doings of her time.

On the side wall opposite are the portraits of the Dean's great-grandfather and grandmother, Rev. William Swift and his wife, called by the Dean "The Heiress of Philpot," a Tudoresque pair. This grandsire, he says, was a divine of distinction in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. He wrote one notable sermon at least, which got into the Bodleian, but the Dean says "I never could get a copy, and I suppose it would now be of little value." He wears the Elizabethan ruff and clerical habit of the day. Swift calls him the founder of the Irish branch; he and his father, Thomas Swift, were successively rectors of St. Andrew's, Canterbury, whither they had migrated from the cradle of the family in Yorkshire, and he tells us that both these pictures were, when he wrote, in the possession of his cousin of Swiftsheath. The lady is the more interesting, for her dutiful grandson says she was a capricious, ill-natured and passionate woman, and that her portrait has a good deal of the shrew in her countenance, and that according to family tradition she disinherited her only son Thomas (the Dean's grandfather) for no greater crime than that of robbing an orchard when a boy. Mr. Deane Swift's note adds that she threatened to whip her said son, when mature and a graduate, for some trifling misdemeanour. Yet this portrait rather suggests strength than shrewishness; its lines and expression remind one of the Dean himself, and hint that his own masterfulness may have been in some degree hereditary from this Heiress of Philpot. She perhaps justified her opinion of the heinousness of apple stealing and its penalty of disherison by the precedent of the sin of her own first parents and the expulsion from Paradise, and the ill consequence of undue use of this fruit was exemplified in the case of the Dean himself, if he was right in attributing, as he always did, the chronic disease of his life which ended in catastrophe to a surfeit of apples in his boyhood. Mr. Deane Swift's note tells us that both these pictures were done in 1623, when the gentleman was fifty-seven and the lady fifty-four.

Then comes the portrait of the disinherited Thomas himself, the Dean's grandfather, and next to the Dean the most romantic figure of the Swifts. He was the rector of Goodrich, near Ross in Herefordshire, renowned for his courage and loyalty to Charles I., "whose sufferings and hardships for the person and cause of that blessed martyr Prince," the autobiography says, "were more than those of any of his condition in England." He was plundered at Goodrich by the Roundheads, the Dean proceeds, six and thirty times, some say above fifty, and he adds the story of the £300 given by this poor rector to his king. It is amplified by Deane Swift's notes taken from Mercurius Rusticus, "Sufferings of the Clergy," and reads like a page from the Macedonian atrocities. The Earl of Stamford, commanding in Hereford for the Parliament in 1642, sent Captain Kirle with seventy troopers; in spite of a petition for mercy from Mrs. Swift, they carried off all the provisions and household stuff in the rector's own carts and horses, and when the lady with her babe sought to escape a trooper threatened to shoot her dead with a pistol to her breast. Petitions to the Earl for restitution being scoffed at, it was at last agreed that four of the horses should be redeemed by the Swifts, who then returned with their two children and restored their home, whereupon the troopers returned more than once, again denuded all things, stript the children and even the cradled baby, and when the little ones hung screaming by their dress, "they swung them about unwilling to part with them, until their holdfast failing they dashed them against the walls." These ruffians avowed their intention of destroying every Royalist in the district, and menaced the miller that if he ground corn for these children they would grind him in his own mill. But the stalwart rector was not to be crushed. His offence was a sermon in Ross on "Give unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's," and his having brought arms into Monmouth, which last charge was denied. Despite the many plunderings he managed to secrete some money and chattels in a hole dug beneath the basement, and escaped to Raglan Castle, then held for the King by the Marquess of Worcester. "What can you do for the King?" said the Marquess. "I give him this coat," replied the rector. "That's not much," rejoined his lordship, looking at it. "Then I give this waist-coat." And Thomas handed it over and bid the governor weigh it. It was ripped, and was found, the Dean says, lined with three hundred broad pieces of gold, which as it proved a seasonable relief must be allowed an extraordinary supply from a private clergyman with ten children with a small estate so often plundered and soon after turned out of his livings in the Church. This story had strong hold on the Dean's imagination, for in his last letter but one to Pope in April, 1739, introducing to him his Cousin Deane, he says: "My grandfather was so persecuted and plundered two and fifty times by the barbarity of Cromwell's hellish crew . . . that the poor old gentleman was forced to sell the better half of his estate to support his family. However, three of his sons had better fortune, for coming over to this kingdom, and taking to the law, they all purchased good estates of which Mr. Deane Swift has a good share, but with some encumbrance." The portrait of Thomas is of a young man; we learn from Deane that it was taken when he was twenty-eight in the same year, 1623, with those of his father and mother above described. He died in 1658, just too soon to be rewarded on the Restoration, and so, as the Dean says, "his merit died with himself, but he managed to keep his place at Goodrich which he had purchased, and on which he built the house in 1636, which at the time of the autobiography belonged to Deane Swift and is now owned by Mr. Swift of Swiftsheath. The architecture, says the Dean, denotes the builder to have been somewhat singular, and Deane adds that there never was nor ever will be such another building to the end of the world, and though added to in after years the photograph at Swiftsheath confirms this opinion.

The heroine of this romance, Mrs. Thomas Swift, was Elizabeth Dryden, daughter of John Dryden and sister of the great poet's grandfather. Dryden and Swift were therefore second cousins, but the Dean never forgave the severe judgement on the youthful odes to Archbishop Sancroft and Sir William Temple written when Swift was not much over twenty. Dryden then was the king in literature, and more than sixty, when he said, "Cousin Swift, you will never make a Poet," wherein in a sense he was quite right.

The rector of Goodrich was indeed a Parson Quiverful. Of his fourteen children five sons came to Ireland. Godwin, the eldest, who was called to the bar, married first a relation of the Marchioness of Ormonde, and for this, as well as the family loyalty, was patronized by the great Duke after the Restoration and made by him his Attorney-General of the County Palatine of Tipperary. Thus Swiftsheath came into the family; it is just seven miles from the castle of the Ormonde's in Kilkenny. The third of this uncle Godwin's wives was Hannah Deane, sole daughter of Admiral Deane, one of Cromwell's regicides, a marriage which our autobiography says was to the great offence of the family. The Swiftsheath dining room has nevertheless a good portrait of the admiral, strong-visaged and determined, and like the regicide that he was. On the opposite wall and side by side are two good three-quarter length portraits of Deane Swift (the editor of the autobiography) and his wife, Mary Harrison, who was also of the Swifts. Deane was a grandson of Godwin and of Admiral Deane, and Mary was daughter of Mrs. Whiteway by her first husband, she having been Martha Swift, daughter of Adam, the youngest brother of Godwin, and thus our Dean's cousin german. These portraits are of a good-looking and youthful couple, Deane of an intellectual cast, dark and pale, Mary is ruddy and of a fair countenance. The Dean through long years was most hostile to the family and memory of his uncle Godwin, whose fortunes failing in his old age compelled him to withdraw the support he had given his nephew both at school and the Dublin University. But when in his own decline his cousin, Martha Whiteway, came to the Deanery to be his amanuensis and nurse, he became greatly attached to her and her daughter Mary Harrison, his letters to whom are tender and loving. Then young Deane became engaged to Mary, and this brought him, too, into the Dean's confidence and good graces and healed the family feud.

THE PORTRAITS OF STELLA

THE premier portrait of Stella is certainly that in the dining-room of Mr. G. Villiers Briscoe at Bellinter, co.

1 and 2. Meath, of which a photographic reproduction
The Bellinter appears in the second volume of this edition.
Stellas. It is a splendid likeness of a splendid woman.

Its presence on the side-wall fills the room as a presiding genius looking out in clear womanhood, her snowy, pillared neck beneath her jet-black hair. In the valley of her full bosom are two roses, red and white, as of Lancaster and York, rising from her pearly dress with a background of blue-green poplin, probably one of Swift's "stuffs," half silk, half wool, which he tried to introduce in London when he presented Queen Caroline with the sample, for not propagating which he never forgave her. This portrait was first engraved for Sir William Wilde in 1848, in whose "Closing Years of Swift" it forms the frontispiece. Wilde thinks it is the portrait of a young girl, but whilst the artist and the genesis are not known now, what we do know would show this to be all but impossible, and that it must have been painted some time about 1717-1718, when Stella was about thirty-five or thirty-six. We know how many ladies there are who retain their girlish beauty to that age and after, and especially women of the wholesome, balanced type of poor Esther Johnson—"so soft and yet so firm a mind," as Swift says of her in his "Birthday Verses," when she was more than forty. And this likeness itself is of maturer mien than that of a girl of twenty. Its commanding air, appropriate to the fullness of womanhood, is seldom possessed by youthful beauties, or when it is may be anything but a grace.

That Stella retained her personal charms throughout her thirties there is ample evidence. Swift wrote her annual birthday verses each year from 1719, when she was thirty-seven, to 1726, when she was forty-four, and though in these he rather brutally rallies her on her advancing years, in the first, after comparing her when first he saw her at sixteen, the brightest virgin on the green, he adds:

So little is thy form declined ;
Made up so largely in thy mind.

In the next year, speaking of the Promethean fire of her soul, he says:

To that you owe the nobler flame,
To this the beauty of your frame.

And in 1725, when she was forty-three, and then indeed in the beginning of the illness, the decay of the broken heart, of which she died three years later, he bids her go down to Quilca for restoration, and prophesies:

Where mirth and exercise and air
Will soon your appetite repair,
* * * * *
Will agitate the lazy flood
And fill your veins with sprightly blood ;
* * * * *
And if your flesh and blood be new
You'll be no more the former you ;
But for a blooming nymph will pass
Just fifteen, coming summer's grass,
Your jetty locks with garlands crowned,
While all the squires for nine miles round
* * * * *
Shall leave deciding broken pates
To kiss your steps at Quilca gates.

But all the available evidence points to the period of the portrait surmised above. The continuous tradition has always been that it belonged to Charles Ford of Woodpark and was presented by him to Mr. Preston of Bellinter, who was Member for Navan in 1731. Ford was a noted man about town in the last years of Queen Anne, a persona grata with the great Tories of the day, introduced by Swift to the Duke of Ormonde, and to Harley and Bolingbroke, whom Ford in his letters calls the Colonel and the Captain. He was then Swift's intimate confidant, constantly mentioned in the "Journal to Stella" as entertaining him at dinner and opera often twice in the week, and with him spending evenings at the Vanhomrighs. When Harley and Bolingbroke quarrelled in the Queen's last illness, he was Swift's go-between in his effort to set them at one, and to him was entrusted the Dean's pamphlet, "Free Thoughts on the Present State of Affairs," written with that intent, and brought by Ford to Bolingbroke, but suppressed immediately on the Queen's death. To him also, years afterwards, the Dean entrusted the manuscript of "Gulliver" to take secretly to the printer. Ford's biography has not been written, but he was certainly a notable, and his letter to Swift in 1714, with most interesting particulars of Queen Anne's death-bed, is a very valuable contribution to the then contemporary history. After the debacle of the Tories consequent on the Queen's death, Ford retired to Ireland, like the Dean himself, sorely chagrined at what, though Irish born, he regarded as banishment; but he did not settle here at once, for though he came over in the autumn of 1714 we find him writing in 1716 from Paris en route for Italy. And in a birthday lyric addressed to him by Swift (1 January, the year is not given, but it should probably be 1715 or 1716), Swift, condoling, urges him to follow his own example, who, though he thought his spleen would burst when sent home to St. Patrick's in 1714, had at last learnt to acquiesce and make the best of it. He bids him try to substitute Stephen's Green and Dawson Street for St.

James's Park and Pall Mall, the Dean himself and Sheridan for Pope and Gay, the Deanery House for the Thatched Club, and Stella for the Duchess of Montagu, Marlborough's lovely youngest daughter:

She's now as handsome every bit,
And has a thousand times her wit.

And Ford would seem to have taken the advice at last, for he took up his residence a year or two afterwards in his paternal home of Woodpark, and there for several successive years was generously hospitable, the Dean and Stella being his most frequent and most welcome guests. Swift's famous lines, "Stella at Woodpark," have made the place classic in the topographies of the Kingdom. He mercilessly chaffs her on being obliged to return to her obscure lodgings on Ormonde Quay from her six months' stay (it was in 1722-1723) in the luxury of the house of Don Carlos, as he styles Charles Ford; from rich venison and quails and Pontac wine to her own meagre board:

From purling streams and fountain's bubbling,
To Liffey's stinking tide in Dublin,

Making amends only in the final couplet:

For though my raillery were true,
A cottage is Wood Park with you.

It may fairly be inferred that it was in the first of these years that Ford had Stella painted, though it is probable that this premier portrait was not finished till some time after from an original study, for in the same room at Bellinter is another Stella traditionally said to have been the first sent there from Woodpark. It is in pose and outline nearly identical with the finished portrait, but as a painting wholly inferior, as uncomparable as that of Hamlet's uncle to that of Hamlet's father, though it wears the two roses and the pearly dress. On Ford's death his estates and belongings passed to Mr. Preston of Bellinter, and with these the Stella portraits. Here she still reigns in beautiful surroundings. The windows look out on the river Boyne and the green wooded plains trend upward to the Hill of Tara some four miles away, from which one of the Prestons took the title of Lord Tara some hundred years ago. Near the Stellas is an old portrait of the Dean, which probably also came from Woodpark, but it is neither a Jervas nor a Bindon, and I cannot therefore classify it as painted in the Dean's lifetime. The last of the Prestons passed away in this generation, and Bellinter and Woodpark too came to Mr. Briscoe, whose kindness I take this occasion to acknowledge for the pleasant visit I have lately enjoyed.

WOODPARK

But while Woodpark has always been a classic name with Swiftians, even its site had long since passed from living cognizance, and in our generation was known only to very few even of Dublin antiquarians: the clearest signpost in the old books was a note that it was Mr. Ford's residence about eight miles from Dublin, which means about eleven at the present day; so it was only by the aid of my friend, Mr. F. Elrington Ball, the historian of the co. Dublin, and the Ordnance Survey maps that I lately discovered and visited it. And yet its situation is conspicuous enough in the plain of Meath, in the centre of the fine country ridden over in the winter by the Ward Hunt and the Meath foxhounds, and the Fairy House racecourse extends close by. It is a curious and quaint old-fashioned place, occupying some hundred and twenty acres of the rich Meath pasture lands, so thickly planted as to justify the ancient name, the beech copses.

glorious in the spring, spangled with primroses on the ground and in the hedges. But the house is in ruinous dilapidation. It has at a distance the aspect of an old Norman castled house with five embattled turrets; but these are only the ornamented tops of old chimney breasts. The base is surrounded by a miniature moat crossed by bridges at the front and side entrances as if they were drawbridges, but they are of stone. Within, it has the appearance of a gutted castle, for the beams and joists of the several stories are but decaying fragments.

Yet standing in the ground floor you can still trace the position of the thirty-three rooms which attest to Ford's hospitalities. The great entrance leads into a hall running from front to rear of the building, over which was the grand drawing-room of equal size, on the broken wall of which yet stands a good chimney-piece of the Queen Anne period, for which the owner lately refused many pounds, thus betokening, we may hope, some purpose to restore the whole. The dreaminess of the place is enhanced by a subterranean passage, which leads from the moat into an old-time garden, some seventy yards long, and through which a man can walk at his full height, but of the purpose of which there is no tradition. The country people speak of this place as Dean Swift's house, for Ford's name is forgotten; but genius is sometimes an expropriator, and the guest, or the ghost of the guest, has become seised of the freehold of his host. The demesne is bordered by what Camden would call a riveret, which is the upper water of the river Tolka, and this thus forms another silver thread in the memories of Stella and Swift, flowing down from Woodpark to connect it with that other haunt of theirs at Delville, of which anon. Well-known in its suburban vale as the sauntering tryst of city sweethearts, this Tolka came as a heaven-sent rhyme—the only one perhaps in the English language by which the poetasters could lyricize the Polish dance that captured these islands sixty years ago—yet few are the Dublin folk who know it by name in these its upper reaches at Woodpark, near its fountain in the upland levels of Royal Meath.

The photograph, from which the drawing here reproduced was made, was given me by Miss Davidson, the daughter of the rector of the parish in which Woodpark lies, who most kindly accompanied me over the place.

(3) The portrait of Stella, of which the pedigree is most authentic, subject perhaps to that at Bellinter, is the Berwick in the possession of my co-trustees and myself, and which appears engraved as the frontispiece to the "Journal to Stella," in the second volume of this edition. It was in the possession of the Rev. Edward Berwick, as already stated, in the early part of the last century, when Sir Walter Scott visited him in Dublin. Of this Sir Walter says, in his Memoir prefixed to his edition of Swift's works: "The only portrait of Stella known to exist is in the possession of my kind and respected friend the Rev. Mr. Berwick." This, we may assume, was on Dr. Berwick's information: his memories went far back into the century before, and he well knew many of the survivors from Swift's own days. Wilde, who regarded the Bellinter portrait as a discovery of his own, disparages this Berwick Stella because the black tresses show some shades of brown, as those of most dark beauties do when the light is full upon them. The expression is not so queenly, perhaps, as in the Bellinter No. 1; it is more pensive, and is manifestly very like the lady it depicts. It is in fine preservation, and was exhibited by the late Judge Berwick at the South Kensington Exhibition of 1867, and lately at the Exhibition at Cork in 1902; and again in Belfast in 1904.

(4) The Irish National Portrait Gallery has a very fine Stella, artistically superior to either of the Bellinters or the Berwick. It rises through the brown medium of the background erect and rounded as a statue, which is one of the high marks of true portrait painting. The head and bust do not confront us as do the others, but are turned half aside; the face, however, slightly turned so as to show three-quarters: the black tresses are of the strong and wiry texture which causes them to curl in irregular coils, and they show still more brown lights than the Berwick, and are not the raven blue-black which Wilde deemed essential. The eyes are very beautiful, dark brown. As a likeness it is not perhaps equal to the Bellinter or the Berwick, for there is something of smallness in the contour of the mouth which takes from the dignity seen in these two portraits. But it is manifestly the same lady and of similar date and mould: similar in the pose of the erect neck and the swelling bosom, which almost escapes from the confinement of the close-fitting pearl bodice, identical with that of Bellinter, the sleeves lined similarly with Swift's green poplin. And yet this portrait has a very doubtful pedigree. It was purchased for the Gallery from a Dublin dealer in 1893, who only knew of it that he bought it about 1891 at the sale of a Mr. Harvey, who had been a wealthy merchant in Dublin for over fifty years. Mr. Strickland is strongly of opinion that it was painted by Jervas, and it is very probable that it was so, for he was some eighteen months in Ireland in 1716-17, and we know his tendency to replicas.

(5) Major Connellan, D.L., of Coolmore, co. Kilkenny, has in his fine collection three interesting portraits of Stella, Vanessa, and the Dean himself, the pedigree of which, though they are long in the family, is also obscure. The Stella, however, at once declares itself a replica or copy of the Bellinter picture. The pose, the figure, and the dress are identical, save that a green silk tie at the bosom takes the place of the red and white roses, whilst the silk bodice is saffron instead of pearl colour, and the green poplin overshawl is less developed than at Bellinter. But it is noteworthy that the black tresses are not the raven or blue-black, on which Sir W. Wilde set such store as essential to Stella, but in the full light show a brown tinge as in the Berwick portrait. Vanessa's portrait is apparently of the same date and artistic style in the fashion of the costume and pose or the figure; like the Stella of Bellinter it is set in an oval, painted on the canvas, and as in it a green poplin shawl droops from the bust. Her face is certainly not beautiful, rather what we might name of the pansy type, pale, sentimental and weakish, although intellectual; the mouth plaintive and inquiring, but not lovely, yet characteristic as of a blue-stocking who died of love. The hand and arm, however, are slender, very graceful and pathetic.

The Coolmore Swift I am unable to classify; it is a fair likeness, but does not correspond with any of the known contemporary portraits. It is full in the face, but has neither the lurid traits of the known Bindons nor the brightness of the Jervases, and I would surmise that it was one of the many painted after his death and when the popularity of his fame created such a demand. It is like the Swift mentioned in the notice of the Bellinter Stella, which for the same reasons I am unable to classify.

The surroundings of these portraits are lovely indeed. Coolmore, the great angle, as the name imports, occupies an exquisite valley of the river Nore, where it flows below Kilkenny to the Barrow and Waterford. Checked by the hills as in a corner near the entrance to the demesne, the river turns and sweeps round the base in a splendid curve between the densely wooded slopes, bright and beautiful as anything in the island. Coolmore possesses a unique and most characteristic memento of the Dean, which was in the year 1904 lent to the great exhibition at St. Louis. It is a wonderful chair, having at its back a broad ledge serviceable as a desk, so that the Dean, when sitting in thought or reading, could turn and, astride on the seat, record his notes or musings. It was kept for the Dean in what was known as his room at Luttrellstown, near Lucan, by his intimate friends the Luttrells, with whom it was his habit to stay for the night on his walking visits to Vanessa in the early seventeenth-twenties, making Luttrellstown a half-way house to Vanessa's Marley Abbey, near Celbridge. The last of the Luttrells was Lord Carhampton, at whose death the place was sold to the celebrated Luke White, the father of the first Lord Annaly, by whom the chair was presented to the Connellan family, as already the possessors of the Vanessa portrait, after resting in Swift's room for 140 years.

(6) In the frontispiece of the eighteenth volume of Faulkner's edition of Swift's Works, 1768, appears the only likeness of Stella given to the world in the time of her contemporaries. It is artistically poor as compared with the book illustrations of our age, but a century and a half ago these were generally sorry affairs, though called by the publishers "embellishments," and Faulkner's embellishments of Gulliver are execrable though curious. This engraving is not so; it is characteristic enough and evidently a good likeness, the pillared neck and bust and the flowing tresses corresponding with the extant painted portraits. It is inscribed "Stella. From an original drawing by the Rev. George Parnel, Archdeacon of Clogher, in the possession of G. Faulkner." There is a blunder here in the Christian name George, for this was the once famous poet and brilliant classical scholar Dr. Thomas Parnell, and herein is the chief interest of this engraving and sketch, another evidence of the charm which Stella exercised over the most eminent intellects who came within the scope of her effortless and modest attraction, including Addison, not to speak of Swift himself. We can almost fix the date of this original sketch. Parnell, though Archdeacon of Clogher, held the living of Finglas, close to Dublin, a Swiftian home, for he had it in succession to "Dilly" Ashe, one of the punning coterie known as the Cartilians, into which Swift drew Lord Pembroke when Lord Lieutenant in 1707-9. Parnell died prematurely in 1717 at Chester on his way to Ireland; but a year or two before he, too, had retired in dudgeon from London, where he chiefly loved to live; and in 1716, when Jervas, as already mentioned, visited Ireland and painted him, there are letters to him from Pope, Gray and Arbuthnot, imploring him to come back to them, which appear at length in Goldsmith's life of this poet. At this time he lived in close intimacy with Swift, and we may take this year, 1716, as pretty certainly the time when he comforted his exile in the company of Stella.

DELVILLE

(7) In a little Greek temple in the grounds of Delville, Glasnevin, the old home of Dr. Patrick Delany, Swift's friend, and Dean of Down, was for more than a century attached to the front wall beneath the pediment a circular medallion showing the face of a young lady done in oils, which tradition represented as Stella, painted by Mrs. Delany, the doctor's wife. If painted by either of his wives, it was certainly not done in Stella's lifetime. His second wife, Mary Granville (Mrs. Pendarves), the Mrs. Delany, the writer of the great Memoirs, did not come to Ireland till 1730, and was not married to Dean Delany till 1743, and his first wife, Margaret Tennison, who brought him his fortune, was only married to him in 1732, four years after Stella was in her grave. If it was then a post mortem, hearsay likeness, that may account for its having been a very poor one, so poor as to raise a doubt if it was meant for Stella at all. It was engraved for Sir William Wilde's "Closing Years of Swift," as he saw it at Delville in 1848, and he says that the engraving exactly represents it in its then condition. The profile is not like Stella's; her fine columnar neck is poked forward at an angle of forty-five degrees, and her face is similarly projected so as to make the profile a triangle, the apex formed by a pointed nose, though Stella's was straight and comely. Wilde says the medallion, when he saw it, was falling to decay, and some twenty years since its fragments were removed. But the temple still remains a shrine to her memory, and the whole place is haunted with phantoms of a hundred and twenty years gone by. It is interesting indeed to visit Delville in our day, as, by the kindness of its owner, Mr. O'Keefe, I have lately done, and compare the scene with Swift's disparaging descriptive verses, laughable enough for anyone but the owner, but so unjust as to be absolutely insulting, and amounting to a very slander of title, for Delany's taste and pains to beautify his home and grounds are scoffed and jeered at so as to make it strange that even Swift could have addressed such a lampoon to his friend :

A single crow can make it night,
When o'er your farm she takes her flight.
Yet in this narrow compass we Observe a vast variety.

Then, alluding to the walks, the parterres and dells, the grass and corn :

A razor, though to say't I'm loth,
Would shave you and your meadows both.

Worse than this, when we remember how the generous home was ever open to him and his :

Though small 's the farm yet here 's a house
Full large to entertain a mouse,
* * * *
For if it 's entered by a rat,
There is no room to bring a cat.

The rivulet coursing down the dell is compared to the tears on a wrinkled cheek or the rain on a leek blade :

And this you call your sweet meander
Which might be sucked up by a gander.

Now the ancient inclosing wall, standing as when this lampoon was written, embraces a dozen acres at least, no contemptible demesne, when within less than two miles of the Castle of Dublin. And the site is very beautiful; it lies on the southern slope of the Glasnevin uplands, overhanging the valley of the Tolka, and the bridge which separates it from the town as the river flows east to the Bay of Dublin. The grounds tumble about in verdant knolls, which lent themselves to Delany's landscape gardening tastes of which much evidence remains to this day. A semicircular glen half surrounds the place at its further side, down which the rivulet glides into the Tolka, and from this is derived the name of Delville, long called Hell Delville, I know not why. On the highest elevation of the northern bounds is the temple above-named, long known as Stella's Bower. It was erected by Delany, for in another versified and satirical epistle to him, Swift alludes to it: "To Fame a temple you erect." On the architrave of the pediment is the motto, "Fastigia despicit urbis," presumably Swift's suggestion with its double meaning for "despicit" of overlook and despise, like our own phrase, "look down upon." In the basement is a sort of crypt, in which the legend goes that Swift had a printing-press and worked at it here for his anonymous libels. The temple does, indeed, command a view of the roofs and spires of the city, and far beyond these, over the plain of Dublin, a view of the beautiful chain of blue mountains that form the bounds of the county, with Wicklow and Kildare in the south; surely no despicable sight. And the high grounds close by look across the Tolka on the adjacent upland, which forms our famous Botanic Gardens, with O'Connell's column tall in the Glasnevin cemetery beyond. Cognate classic ground indeed, for in the centre of these gardens still stands "Addison's Walk," a shadowed aisle between two-and-twenty yews, an ideal saunter for a poet's ghost. Here it was "The Spectator" walked in life with Tickell, his poet friend who occupied the place when they were respectively secretary and under-secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, after the House of Hanover came in, and here Tickell renewed his intimacy with Swift, to whom he pays the tribute: "The strictest critic and the kindest friend." The house itself of Delville is in excellent preservation; its fine inhabited hall with dining-room and drawing-room at each side, are much as in Swift and Delany's time; an ancient circular Gothic window which partly lights the dining-room is fixed in an eighteenth-century alcove, and the old walls testify to the date. Behind the main building is a range of bedrooms in a seven-windowed return, testifying still to the large-hearted hospitality of the host, which might have spared him from Swift's flouting even were his residence less large. Indeed his hospitality was frankly acknowledged by Swift himself; for in a letter to Pope long after Stella's time,¹ he says Delany is one of the few men not spoilt by access of fortune, whose hospitality and generosity left him without money as before; and elsewhere he styles him the only gentleman he knows who can maintain a regular hospitality, having seven or eight friends at dinner a week, of whom, we may be sure, the Dean was always one. The truth is, Swift, who could not bear the slightest joke when made at his own expense, could not understand how any one could take offence at his own offensiveness; as when taunting the cook-maid whom he saw scraping a leg of mutton he asked her how many maggots she had got out of it, and she replying, "Not so many as in your head," he got into a rage and complained of her insolence to her mistress. But the idiosyncrasy of a genius is a mass of inconsistencies.

In his arrogance he conceived that even sneers from himself were a compliment to his victim, and that a final kindly couplet in a libel addressed to Stella on Sheridan, more than atoned for pages of ill-natured or unmannerly impertinence, as when he concludes his satire on Delville with the handsome tribute:

In short, in all your boasted seat,
There's nothing but yourself that's great.¹

I cannot leave these likenesses of poor Stella without recalling one lineament at least which she has left us of her ¹ In Sir Walter Scott's several editions this jeu d'esprit on Delville is published amongst Swift's poems, but with a footnote: "This was not Swift's, but written by Dr. Sheridan.—S." This "S" does not mean Scott, who copied it from Nichols' edition, 1808. The "S" is Thomas Sheridan, on whose pretentious book Nichols' editions are founded. He was the son of the Dr. Sheridan, Swift's comrade and friend. His book was published in 1784, nearly forty years after Swift's death, and his ostentation of intimacy with one whom he scarcely could have known after his own father's death in 1736, when he was a lad of sixteen, as well as his general unreliability, are severely exposed by John Forster, "Life of Swift," p. 31.

Swift and Sheridan were so long used to shuttle pasquinades at each other that it might indeed be difficult now to decide the paternity of any when a question arises between them, but the internal evidence seems strong to show Swift to be the author of "Delville." Not only is the humour essentially Swiftian—ribaldry, closing in a fine compliment—but the motif, the belittling of his victim's home, had notably inspired Swift years before his acquaintance with Delany. In 1703 Whitehall had been partially burnt down, and Vanbrugh, poet, playwright, architect, Clarenceux herald, and man about town, set to build himself a house on the site and from the debris; and this, as he meant it to be, became the talk of the coffee houses. Swift had met him at Wills' and St. James's, and now made him his target. The first version of "Vanbrugh's House" in Swift's writing was unearthed by John Forster at Narford, amongst Sir A. Fountaine's papers. In this, jeering at the building, as the outcome of the dramatist's last farce, he writes:

Which in due time brings forth a house,
Just as the mountain did the mouse:
One story high, one postern door,
And one small chamber on a floor.

This handed round unprinted was so received as to spur Swift to repolish his shafts. In 1706 a new version was published in which the mental portrait. In the period when the Dean was writing her birthday verses, she replied by a birthday ode to him on the 30th November, 1721, when he had just reached sneer was expanded. Assailing Van's last farce as a failure, stolen from the French for plot and jokes, he compares with it his last work in architecture:

The building as the poet writ
Rose in proportion to his wit—

the brother poets ran to see the house of brother Van, sought for it vainly, till—

At length they in the rubbish spy
A thing resembling a goose pie—
Thrice happy poet who may trail
Thy house about thee like a snail,
Or harnessed to a nag at ease,
Take journeys in it like a chaise.
Capacious House, 'tis owned by all,
Thou'rt well contrived though thou art small,
For every wit in British isle
May lodge within thy spacious pile.

This set the wits in a roar at Vanbrugh's expense, notwithstanding their own share in his satire of the tiny abode. Vanbrugh was so far patient, but afterwards appointed architect of Blenheim by the great Duke, whose popularity was then beginning to wane, Swift, now a literary king, published his twin lampoon—"The History of Vanbrugh's House"—in 1708. The artist's model, he says, was a little girl's house of cards from which Van resolved to build

A real house, with room and stairs,
Five times at least as big as theirs;
Taller than miss's by two yards,
Not a sham thing of clay or cards.
And so he did, for in a while
He built up such a monstrous pile
That no two chairmen could be found
Able to lift it from the ground.

Concluding—

And now the Duke has wisely ta'en him
To be his architect at Blenheim.

fifty-four, she being then, as the ode tells us, thirty-six. It is full of a grace and a graciousness which make it more worthy than hundreds of his own witty splenetic couplets

Or if his grace were no more skilled in
The art of battering than of building,
We might expect to see next year
A mousetrap-man chief engineer.

This last was a stroke below the belt. Vanbrugh was very wrath, but the town laughed louder than before. Swift's letter to Stella, 7th November, 1710, says, "I dined to-day at Sir Richard Temple's, with Congreve, Vanbrugh, etc. Vanbrugh, I believe I told you, had a long quarrel with me about those verses on his house, but we were very civil and cold. Lady Marlborough used to tease him with them, which had made him angry though he be a good-natured fellow." And a few days after he tells her that dining with Secretary St. John, Prior, the poet, came in, talking to whom St. John said—"The best thing I ever read is not yours, but Dr. Swift's on Vanbrugh." Swift adds—"Though I do not reckon it so very good either."¹ Yet Bolingbroke's praise surely made him proud of his whim. And so in the same year, 1710, varying the theme he wrote—"The Little House by the Churchyard of Castleknock," where his friend, Archdeacon Walls, was rector. It lay on the road to his own Laracor. The archdeacon lived in Dublin, but used the cottage as "his country seat." Swift now gibes at it as really the top of the church steeple, of which at least twelve inches fell in a storm, and by gravitation kept its form on the ground. Every one is puzzled—

A traveller who by did pass,
Observed the roof behind the grass,
On tiptoe stood and reared his snout,
And saw the parson creeping out,
Was much surprised to see a crow
Venture to build his nest so low.

Then a schoolboy takes it for a blackbird's crib; Swift's curate thinks it was an oven to bake one loaf, or a cot for a single dove; and Stella decides it to be a still without the spout, and so on. The Wallses were then his closest intimates.

The grotesque whimsey had thus been made a patent of his own, "Delville" is only another variation, which written by Sheridan would which are exalted by the name of Swift's poems. Its final lines are:

Long be the day that gave you birth
Sacred to friendship, wit and mirth;
Late dying may you cast a shred
Of your rich mantle o'er my head;
To bear with dignity my sorrow—
One day alone, then die to-morrow.

The chaste pathos, the intense though suppressed devotion, "the dignified obedience," the proud yet modest feminine self-consciousness, of the little poem through and through, indicate the current, however concealed, of the passion which was the main stream of her life, and the cause of her premature passing to her rest. They give us a glimpse of the womanly spirit and the artless enchantment which not only attracted those amongst whom she had her being, but have drawn towards her gentle shade the tender sympathy and the indignant pity of thousands and thousands of the best of those who have lived in all the years since she went to her repose in the aisle of our national Cathedral. They make one understand at least the enthusiasm of the passionate Italian who fell enamoured of his ideal of Beatrice Cenci, centuries after her tragic story had closed, and sent him as a lover to try to discover the spot where she lies in the Church of St. Pietro in Montorio on the Janiculum, raging against those who had sought to conceal it for ever in their shame for the cruelty and avarice that had consigned her to her premature doom.

have been a flagrant infringement and servile imitation, for which Swift, who, pro more, petted and bullied him in turns, would probably have trounced him well.

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN SWIFT AND STELLA

BY THE
VERY REV. J. H. BERNARD, D.D., D.C.L.
DEAN OF ST. PATRICK'S

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN SWIFT AND STELLA

THE story of Swift and Stella has been discussed by every student of English literature, but it has never been told in full, for the reason that materials are not forthcoming for a complete narrative. Whatever his motive, Swift took care that posterity should not be informed as to his real feelings towards the charming woman who was, at any rate, his dearest friend. Was he a lover as well as a friend? Did he marry her? If he did marry her, why did he not acknowledge her as his wife? If he did not marry her, did he disappoint her hopes? To these questions we can give no certain or final answer. All that can be done now is to gather together such scraps of evidence as are still available—the opinion of his acquaintances as to the relations between the Dean and the lady whom he delighted to honour; the stories current after his death; the indications of affection and protecting friendship which his “Journal” reveals.

When Swift went to Moor Park for the first time, at the end of 1689, being then a young man of twenty-two, he found among the members of Sir William Temple's household a Mrs. Johnson, a widow, with two little daughters, Esther and Ann. Mrs. Johnson was a dependent of Lady Giffard, Sir William's sister, and the position she occupied at Moor Park was a subordinate one; but there is no shadow of evidence for the unworthy suggestion that Temple was the father of either of her children. Indeed, so far as Esther—best known to the world as “Stella”—is concerned, her parentage is certified by the register of her baptism at Richmond on 20th March, 1680-81, in which the name of her father, “Edward Johnson,” is set down. Swift has told us that he was “a younger brother of a good family in Nottinghamshire,” adding that Stella’s mother was “of a lower degree,” and that “she had little to boast of her birth.” The truth is, that the story that Stella was Temple’s natural child is as destitute of foundation as the absurd slander that Swift had the same father. Inasmuch as Temple was on the Continent in the diplomatic service for the two years preceding Swift’s birth, it is curious that this notion should ever have gained currency.

The relations between Swift and Stella during these early years were of such intimacy as may subsist between a young man and a childish playfellow, whose lessons he directed, and for whom he had a genuine affection. “I had some share in her education, by directing what books she should read, and perpetually instructing her in the principles of honour and virtue; from which she never swerved in any one action or moment of her life. She was sickly from her childhood until about the age of fifteen; but then grew into perfect health.” There was, of course, no thought of love-making between Swift and the charming, delicate child at this period; nor for at least ten years after their first acquaintance did Swift think of a closer tie with Stella than that of friendship. Whether he ever desired it is a question to which we must return; but for the present we have to recall the fact that in these early years he was no advocate of the single life, and that he had contemplated the possibility of marriage more than once. In a letter to the Rev. John Kendall, written from Moor Park early in 1692, he repudiates the idea that he has any serious intentions with regard to a lady by whom his friend seems to have thought him to have been attracted. He had been amusing himself, and no more. But he adds, significantly enough, that he has made up his mind not to think of marriage until his worldly fortunes were secured, implying—as it would seem—that he looked forward to marriage in the future as the natural condition of middle life. These prudent resolves, however, vanished, temporarily at any rate, when he made the acquaintance of Miss Waring at his country vicarage in 1695. His letter to "Varina" of 29th April, 1696, shows that the young lady had rejected the overtures of the poor Rector of Kilroot who imagined himself to be in love with her, and had asked her to wait for him until he was in a position to marry. "I desire nothing of your fortune; you shall live where and with whom you please till my affairs are settled to your desire." The letter is passionate enough, and it is impossible to doubt that it sincerely represented his feelings at the time. However, change of scene and the larger experience of the world, which his third residence at Moor Park brought him, were sufficient to cure him of this youthful fancy. The curious memorandum which he wrote in 1699, and entitled "When I come to be old," has the following resolutions set down: "Not to marry a young woman"; "Not to be fond of children or let them come near me hardly"; "Not to hearken to flatteries or conceive I can be loved by a young woman." It is tolerably clear that Miss Waring's refusal of his proposals, which she seems at first to have encouraged, had embittered him. Although his morbid resolutions do not suggest that he had given up all thoughts of marriage, they show that he is putting away from him the idea of marriage with a young woman, and that he is reverting to the prudent determination of former years. He had not, however, entirely broken with Varina; and on his appointment to the Vicarage of Laracor and the Prebend of Dunlavin, she seems to have written upbraiding him with the altered tone of his letters, and suggesting that some other lady had engaged his affections. His reply is extant, and it shows Swift at his worst. The insolence and harshness of its phrases were clearly intentional. He would not go back upon his former professions of affection, but he determined to write such a letter as would ensure that Miss Waring would decline any further correspondence. It would have been more manly and generous to have told this capricious young lady that he no longer cared for her; but this he was too proud to do. Varina now passes out of his life, but Swift has shown his characteristic bad breeding in his letter of dismissal.

Some phrases in this letter (dated 4th May, 1700) are, however, important for the understanding of Swift's relations with Stella. "The other thing you would know is whether this change of style be owing to the thoughts of a new mistress. I declare, upon the word of a Christian and a gentleman, it is not; neither had I ever thoughts of being married to any other person but yourself." Now, badly as Swift behaved in this matter at the end, there is no reason to doubt that he is here speaking the truth. He was essentially a truthful man, and I cannot believe that he would have stooped to a lie to shield himself. Up to this, at any rate, he had not contemplated marriage with Stella, although she was now no longer a child, but a blooming girl of eighteen. She had grown into "one of the most beautiful, graceful, and agreeable young women in London, only a little too fat"; and there can be no question that he was much attached to her, as she to him. But that they were more than dear friends there is no evidence, and Swift's denial to Varina that he had ever thought of marriage with anyone but herself is too clear and too emphatic to be set aside.

Sir William Temple died in 1699, and by his will bequeathed some lands at Morristown in co. Wicklow to Esther Johnson, "servant to my sister Giffard." This provided her with an independent, if scanty, fortune; and being advised by Swift that it would go farther in Ireland, and doubtless being attracted also by the prospect of having him near her, she established herself in Dublin in the middle of the year 1701. She had as a companion a Mrs. Rebecca Dingley, then a woman of thirty-five, whose friendship and protection never failed her.

At this time Swift had rooms in Dublin, which Miss Johnson and Mrs. Dingley occupied when he was absent; but on the occasion of any of his visits to Dublin from Laracor, with that prudence and circumspection for which Stella was remarkable, the ladies betook themselves to private lodgings elsewhere. They pursued the same course at Laracor. They would stay at the Vicarage during the Vicar's absence, but never while he was at home. And so it was to the end. Stella was, in later years, a constant visitor at the Deanery, but she did not live there, even with the faithful Dingley as a duenna, while the Dean was in residence. Save during Swift's fits of illness, when he needed a nurse, and she had to be by his side, she and Mrs. Dingley had their head-quarters at their modest lodgings in Ormond Quay.

Most of the next five or six years Swift spent in London. He was there from April to October in 1702; again from November, 1703, to May, 1704; again in 1705, and in the winter of 1707-8; the residue of his time being divided between Dublin and Laracor. It was, of course, well known to his friends that his relations with Miss Johnson were, at the least, very friendly; but no word of scandal seems to have been breathed by anyone. It says much for Stella's dignity and purity of soul, that even the enemies of Swift, some of whom were unscrupulous enough, never impeached her good name.

In 1703 a new actor appears on the scene. Stella was now a beautiful and attractive young woman of twenty-two years of age, and it was natural that suitors for her hand should present themselves. The Reverend William Tisdall, the rector of a Dublin church, formed a friendship with the two ladies at William Street, and frequent letters passed between him and Swift during the latter's stay in London, the one providing political gossip for the entertainment of his Dublin friends, and the other sending news of Stella and Mrs. Dingley. "You seem," wrote Swift (3rd February, 1704) "to be mighty proud (as you have reason, if it be true) of the part you have in the ladies' good graces, especially of her you call the party." The next letter which we have is dated 20th April, and it is clear that in the interval Tisdall had made proposals of marriage to Stella, the unfavourable reception of which he ascribed to Swift's influence. Swift's reply must be quoted at some length: "I might with good pretence enough talk starchly, and affect ignorance of what you would be at; but my conjecture is, that you think I obstructed your inclinations to please my own, and that my intentions were the same with yours. In answer to all which, I will, upon my conscience and honour, tell you the naked truth. First, I think I have said to you before that, if my fortunes and humour served me to think of that state, I should certainly, among all persons on earth, make your choice; because I never saw that person whose conversation I entirely valued but hers; this was the utmost I ever gave way to. And, secondly, I must assure you sincerely that this regard of mine never once entered into my head to be an impediment to you; but I judged it would, perhaps, be a clog to your rising in the world; and I did not conceive you were then rich enough to make yourself and her happy and easy. But that objection is now quite removed by what you have at present, and by the assurances of Eaton's livings." Swift adds that he had recommended Tisdall to Esther's mother (who had married again), and that the objection of his fortune being removed, he had no other to urge. He ends by saying of Stella, "I have nowhere met with an humour, a wit, or conversation so agreeable, a better portion of good sense, or a truer judgment of men and things, I mean here in England; for as to the ladies of Ireland I am a perfect stranger."

Nevertheless, Tisdall's suit did not prosper, and he consoled himself with another lady a couple of years later; but it is evident that, rightly or wrongly, he blamed Swift for his disappointment. Tisdall does not seem to have been a very attractive person, and Stella's rejection of his suit may well have been unprompted. Her affections were pre-occupied. And Swift's letter tells plainly enough that he did not intend to marry her. He was quite satisfied with the friendship which existed between them, and was not anxious for a closer bond. But he can hardly have been unaware that he was acting a selfish part, for his intimacy with Miss Johnson could not fail to create the impression, on the minds of their common friends, that he hoped to claim her one day as a wife. A letter, written by Thomas Swift in 1706, shows that gossip was already busy with their names. The writer asks, "whether Jonathan be married? or whether he has been able to resist the charms of both those gentlewomen that marched quite from Moor Park to Dublin, as they would have marched to the North or anywhere else, with full resolution to engage him?"

Early in the year 1708 Swift made an acquaintance in London which was destined to end in sorrow, and which, in truth, he ought not to have encouraged. He was introduced to Mrs. Vanhomrigh, the widow of a rich merchant, whose younger daughter, Hester—afterwards to be best known under the name of Vanessa—a bright girl of seventeen, was soon attracted by Swift's fascinations. In the summer of 1709 he was back in Ireland, and he spent some days at Bishop Ashe's residences—both at Clogher and Finglas—in the company of Stella and Mrs. Dingley. We find them at Laracor with him in the spring of the next year; and then for three years, from 1710 to 1713, our knowledge of his doings in London is derived almost entirely from the remarkable "Journal" in which from day to day he set down his hopes and fears, his high ambitions and his bodily infirmities, his friendships and his enmities, that his best and dearest friend—for this at least Stella always was—might be admitted to a share in his joys and his sorrows. Never was Journal, intended for eyes other than those of the writer, more frank; never was anything written more tender and affectionate, although—scrupulous as he always was to preserve the semblance of reserve in their intercourse—the letters were addressed to the worthy Mrs. Dingley as well as to her beautiful companion. No one could say that he had written love-letters to Stella, for the letters M D may mean "my dears" in the plural, or "my dear" in the singular, at the reader's discretion. And the "little language" which it seems almost unkind to decipher was not a secret between him and Stella, for Mrs. Dingley was admitted to the tenderness of its intimacy. It is clear, however, that the frequent letters which Swift received from Dublin during the course of this correspondence were not of joint authorship but were written by Stella alone.

Careful as Swift was to guard his language, sentences appear here and there in the "Journal" which, whether he meant it or not, would naturally suggest to the woman who read them that he contemplated something more than friendship, when his affairs became prosperous.

"O faith, I should be glad to be in the same kingdom with M D. . . . But . . . to return without some mark of distinction would look extremely little; and I would likewise gladly be somewhat richer than I am. I will say no more, but beg you to be easy, till Fortune take her course, and to believe that M D's felicity is the great end I aim at in my pursuits."

Or, again: "I would make M D and M E easy; and I never desired more." These sentences are, no doubt, patient of the meaning that when Swift became richer, it would be his happiness to enable Stella and Mrs. Dingley—his best friends—to live somewhat more comfortably than they had hitherto done; but if he meant no more than this, or if he was unconscious that his words would mean more to his correspondent, he wrote with curious and unwonted carelessness.

I have called the "Journal" "frank," and so it is, in truth, in regard to many things which are best kept to oneself; but it is not frank in regard to one at least of his friendships, that with Hester Vanhomrigh, which grew to intimacy during these three years of expectancy in London. Swift tells, indeed, of his frequent entertainment at Mrs. Vanhomrigh's house; but it is significant that her daughter Hester is only mentioned three times throughout the "Journal," and not at all during the later part of it. Certainly, Swift had no thought of marrying Vanessa; nor did she conquer his heart, as Stella had done. She was no more to him than an agreeable young friend; she flattered his vanity, and he was pleased to be the object of her admiration. But the passion with which she learnt to regard him was not returned, and he told her so, shortly before he took up his residence again in Dublin as the Dean of St. Patrick's. He dealt tenderly with the outpouring of her affection (which, however, he should have discouraged from the beginning); and in "Cadenus and Vanessa," which was written for her eye alone, he tried to show her gently but firmly how idle were her hopes. But it is significant, that nothing of all this is confided to the "Journal." He must have been conscious that Stella would not have approved of this episode in his London life—to put it plainly, he must have felt that her jealousy would be aroused. If he had never given Stella any reason to think that she was the queen of his heart, she would have had no just ground for complaint had he bestowed his affections elsewhere, nor would there have been reason for concealing from her that he had made an intimate friend of a girl young enough to be his daughter. That Swift was to blame, for allowing Vanessa to lose her foolish heart to him, is plain enough; but he was still more blameworthy for having hidden the whole business from the woman who was, as she thought, a partner in all the secrets of his life.

This was the state of things when Swift settled down as Dean of St. Patrick's, in August, 1714 (he had been installed a year before). It was a serious embarrassment to him that Vanessa followed him to Ireland, upon her mother's death, and established herself at Celbridge, within ten miles of the Deanery. Her letters are painful reading, for the anguish of her disappointment was great; and while the Dean was careful to continue to treat her as a friend, he gave her no ground to hope for any nearer tie. For nine years she lived on at Celbridge, and then died, a broken-hearted woman, in June, 1723. The circumstances of her death are thus set forth in a contemporary letter, which was first published by the present writer in "Blackwood's Magazine" for November, 1906, and which is of sufficient importance to print here again. It is preserved among Archbishop Wake's letters relating to Ireland in the Library of Christ Church, Oxford, and was written to the Archbishop by Dr. Evans, Bishop of Meath, an old enemy of Swift's, on 27th July, 1723: "I think it not improper for me to acquaint your Grace with a passage lately happened here wherein Jonathan Swift is said to be pretty much concerned. A young woman, Mrs. Van Omrig (a pretended vain wit), and ye Dean had great friendships, many letters and papers passed betwixt them (the subject of which I know nothing of); they give out there was a marriage promise between them, but this I can't affirm. However it be, she designed to give him all her fortune, which was about £5000. In April last she discovered the D. was married to Mrs. Johnson (a nll. daughter of Sir W. Temple, a very good woman), upon which she expresses (in her illness) great indignation, making a new will and leaving all to Dr. Berkeley of this College (who never had seen her but about twice), and to one Mr. Marshall, who was charged by her (on her death bed) to print all the letters and papers which had passed between the D. and herself. 'Tis generally believed she lived without God in ye world. When Dean Price (the Minister of her Parish) offered her his services in her last minutes: she sent him word no Price no Prayers, with a scrap out of the Tale in (sic) the Tub . . . and so she dyed. If anything like this should have fallen to an Englishman he would have been peppered with lampoons, etc. (as ye Bishop of Ferns and others were, without the least colour on grounds most undeservedly). Ye Archbishop of Dublin and ye whole Irish posse have (I fear) prevailed with Mr. Marshall (ye lady's executor) not to print the papers, etc., as she desired, least one of their own dear joys should be trampled over by the Philistines."

This letter is important, as showing that as early as 1723 it was reported, and believed—for Bishop Evans states it as an undisputed matter of fact—that Swift had been married to Stella. We shall presently examine the evidence for the marriage more closely; but Dr. Evans's letter disposes, at any rate, of one argument against its having taken place, which has been put forward by various writers, viz., that the story of the marriage did not get about until after the death of both Swift and Stella. For example, Monck Mason says: "there is every probability that Lord Orrery [whose book was not published until 1752] was himself the first framer of this scandalous story."¹ "The first writer who mentions it," says Professor Churton Collins,² "is

Orrery"; and he adds, "he must have known well enough that what he asserted was contrary to current tradition." The facts, however, are all the other way. The letter of Bishop Evans does not prove, indeed, that Swift and Stella were married (he is undoubtedly wrong about Stella's parentage), but it does prove that five years before Stella's death, and twenty-two years before Swift's, it was believed that a marriage had taken place. And it is also important because it gives testimony as to circumstances connected with Vanessa's death, for which heretofore Orrery (1752), Deane Swift (who wrote in 1755), Delany (1754), and Sheridan (1784), have been reckoned the earliest authorities. Thus Deane Swift writes that, "as I have heard," Vanessa "was not convinced that Dr. Swift was married to Mrs. Johnson until about two months before her decease."¹ This is exactly in agreement with Dr. Evans, who informs us that Vanessa, who died early in June, had not heard of the marriage until April. Again, Dr. Evans is a contemporary witness to the truth of Orrery's story that, shortly before her death, Vanessa cancelled a will made in Swift's favour and made another bequeathing her fortune to Dr. Berkeley and Mr. Marshall.² So too, does he tell, as Delany did afterwards,³ that Vanessa gave directions to her executors that her correspondence with Swift should be published. Sheridan has the same report to give.⁴ Now, the accuracy of these writers on such points being thus remarkably corroborated, their testimony as to the story of the marriage cannot be lightly set aside, as resting on mere gossip or tradition. The significance of Dr. Evans's letter is not that it gives us new information, but that it gives us much earlier testimony—contemporary testimony—to several details in the narratives of Orrery, Sheridan, and the rest.

What, then, is the direct evidence of these writers as to the relations of Swift and Stella? The answer is that every one of them—Orrery, who had little respect for the Dean's memory, Delany, who was his friend, Sheridan, who was the son of his friend, and Deane Swift, who was his relative—accept the report of the marriage as true.

In 1742 Orrery wrote to Deane Swift (4th December) of the melancholy condition of the Dean of St. Patrick's: "A wife could not be banished from his chamber or his unhappy hours of retirement, nor had the Dean felt a blow or wanted a companion had he been married, or in other words had Stella lived." And he says explicitly in his "Remarks" (p. 22) that Stella was "the concealed but undoubted wife of Dr. Swift," adding that the marriage ceremony was performed in 1716 by Dr. Ashe, the Bishop of Clogher, "if my informations are right." Although Stella "remained an unacknowledged wife" (p. 119), yet "I have told you the fact in the manner I have received it from several of Swift's friends and relations" (p. 26). With this statement Dr. Delany, whose "Observations" were written in reply to Lord Orrery, has no quarrel. "Your account of his marriage is, I am satisfied, true" (p. 36); and he goes on to discuss the reasons why Swift did not acknowledge it (pp. 41 ff.). Deane Swift (1755) says the same thing: "That she was married to Dr. Swift in or about the year 1716 I am thoroughly persuaded" (op. cit., p. 92). And in 1766 Hawkesworth states, without any hesitation, in his notes to Swift's letters, that Stella was married in 1716 to the Dean by Bishop Ashe of Clogher.

In 1781 Dr. Johnson, in his "Lives of the Poets," tells the story again, and gives his authority: "In 1716 he was privately married to Mrs. Johnson by Dr. Ashe, Bishop of Clogher, as Dr. Madden told me, in the garden." Here Johnson has given us not only a new authority, viz., Dr. Madden—who probably got his information, as Sir H. Craik suggests,¹ from the elder Sheridan, Swift's friend—but gives us a new detail. He tells us that the marriage ceremony was performed "in the garden," i.e., the garden of the Deanery at Clogher, where tradition still points to the tree under which it is said that the marriage took place.¹ Johnson's words have been misunderstood by all recent writers—so far as I know—to mean that Swift and Stella were married in the garden of the Deanery at Dublin. But there is no tradition of any kind, nor is there any evidence, for this. Whatever we think of the truth of the story, it is important to reduce it to its original form, viz., that the marriage took place at Clogher in co. Tyrone—the Cathedral town of Bishop Ashe, where both the parties had stayed with the same friend seven years before.

The evidence of the Chapter Books as to Swift's movements during the year 1716 is worth setting down, for it has been inaccurately stated by Monck Mason.² Swift was in Dublin up to June; during this month he was absent on a visit at Gallstown, in co. Westmeath (as appears from a letter written to Archbishop King on 17th June); he was back at his Cathedral in July, appointed a sub-dean on 28th July, and does not appear again until a Chapter meeting on 26th November. We have, however, a letter written from Trim on 3rd November, and one from Dublin on 4th October. He appointed a sub-dean a second time on 5th December, and was absent from Visitation and Chapter on 7th January, 1717, but was present at Chapter on 18th March. These dates make it highly probable that if, as reported, the secret marriage was performed at Clogher in the year 1716 (old style), it must have taken place either between 28th July and 4th October, or between 5th December and 18th March (1717). Either date would agree with what we know of Bishop Ashe's movements, for, although he was appointed Bishop of Derry in February, 1717, he was not enthroned in Derry Cathedral, and therefore did not formally leave Clogher, until June of that year.

² Op. cit., p. 301.

We may now rehearse the account printed in 1784 by Sheridan, the son of the Dean's great friend, of the circumstances of the marriage, which he gives on the authority of a Mrs. Sican, a favourite of both Swift and Stella. He says that Swift asked Bishop Ashe to find out what was the cause of Stella's depression of spirits, and that she replied that she had been slandered for her affection for the Dean, and that she had hoped he would have married her. In response to this, on condition that they should live apart as heretofore, and that the matter should be kept a secret, Swift agreed, and they were married by the Bishop without witnesses in the year 1716.

Finally, in 1789, Monck Berkeley, in the Introduction to his "Literary Relics," gives the same account of the matter, adding, "In 1716 they were married by the Bishop of Clogher, who himself related the story to Bishop Berkeley, by whose relict the story was communicated to me." Berkeley was at the time travelling on the Continent in the capacity of tutor to Bishop Ashe's son, and it is no way improbable that he should have been informed of so interesting an event. Monck Berkeley also quotes a letter from Mrs. Hearn, Stella's niece, which explicitly states that the attachment between the Dean and Stella "terminated in their marriage."

It is clear that the evidence of a secret marriage, which I have recapitulated once more, does not amount to demonstration. From the nature of the case, it could not do so, unless Swift or Stella or Bishop Ashe had committed some particulars of it to writing, and this would have been inconsistent with the secrecy of the matter. Stella signed her last will "Esther Johnson, spinster," it being part of the compact, if marriage there was, that it should never be avowed.

All that can be said is, that all of Swift's friends who wrote on the subject after his death believed it to have taken place, with the solitary exception of Dr. John Lyon, who was Swift's constant attendant and guardian during the last sad years of speechlessness and decay. But Dr. Lyon was a child of only six years of age in 1716 (the alleged year of the marriage); he did not come into any relations with the Dean until about 1734, when he was employed in a minor office in the Cathedral liberty; and he was never admitted to any intimacy of friendship. His opinion was also, as I have shown, contrary to the public report which prevailed at the time of Vanessa's death, and as to which Dr. Evans's letter above quoted furnishes testimony. It may be fully admitted that the report was one which was likely to get about, in order to account for the extraordinary friendship between the Dean and Miss Johnson, who, although not acknowledged as his wife, was wont to take the leading place as hostess at his hospitable house. The story may be untrue. But it is corroborated by several independent persons, who derived their information from distinct sources; it was currently believed during the lifetime both of the Dean and Stella, and was never publicly contradicted, and, so far as dates go, there is room for it during two periods in the alleged year 1716.

If it took place, what was its motive? And why was it never acknowledged? These are highly speculative queries, and no one can pretend to give a confident answer. It was Swift's "trade to deal in mysteries," as Bolingbroke wrote to him,¹ and he was entirely successful in concealing the truth as to this strange story, of the prevalence of which he must have been fully aware. But it is clear that if Swift and Stella were married, it was because Stella earnestly desired it. Everything points to the conclusion that Swift would have been quite content that their old relations of friendship and affection should continue to the end. In 1716 he was of the same mind that he had been in when he wrote to Tisdall twelve years before. No doubt his worldly position was now established, and although he was not a rich man and probably still embarrassed by the heavy expenses of taking up his Deanery in 1713, he could afford to marry if he wished. Stella was now thirty-five years of age; his written resolve "not to marry a young woman" (see p. 87 above) had been kept. And his affection and admiration for her had deepened with the progress of the years. But, for all that, he would have preferred to remain single. His habit of saving money was growing upon him, and it is very likely that Delany and Sheridan are correct when they allege, as one of the reasons against marriage in Swift's mind, his unwillingness to increase his expenditure.¹ We may find another, and perhaps more powerful, reason in a growing disinclination to the married state. Always of a "cold temper," as he had said in one of his early letters,² he was far from being a healthy man. The beginnings of the dreadful illness which darkened his old age had made themselves felt; and he knew that all was not well with him. The perverse moods which are reflected in too many of his verses, especially those written in later years, indicate an unhealthy disposition. The indecencies which disfigure his writings have justly been reprov'd by his critics; but it is significant that while Swift is often obscene, he is never licentious. The most natural explanation, as it seems to the present writer, of these morbid imaginings is that he was constitutionally unfitted for marriage at the time when, had he been like other men, he might have been expected to take Stella as the partner of his home.

Scott tells a well-known story, on the authority of Mrs. Delany, which seems to be apposite here. "Immediately subsequent to the ceremony, Swift's state of mind appears to have been dreadful. Delany (as I have learned from a friend of his relict), being pressed to give his opinion on this strange union, said, that about the time it took place, he observed Swift to be extremely gloomy and agitated, so much so that he went to Archbishop King to mention his apprehensions. On entering the library, Swift rushed out with a countenance of distraction, and passed him without speaking. He found the Archbishop in tears, and upon asking the reason, he said, 'You have just met the most unhappy man on earth; but on the subject of his wretchedness you must never ask a question.'

² Swift to Kendall, 11th February, 1692.

Archbishop King was not in Ireland from June, 1716, to July, 1717 (and before June, 1716, Swift was on bad terms with him), so that no interview of the kind mentioned by Delany could have taken place "about the time" of the marriage, or "immediately subsequent to the ceremony." But these notes of time need not be too closely pressed, and Delany's report of his interview with the Archbishop is too circumstantial to be wholly set aside. King's agitation, and the words attributed to him, are easily explicable if it be supposed that Swift had confided to him the real reason of his desiring to lead a single life, despite the mutual affection between him and Stella.

On the other hand, Stella, it can hardly be doubted, had looked forward to a union with the man who loved her and whom she loved devotedly. That he had not claimed her hand before must have been a sore disappointment. Gossip had been busy with their names,¹ and this was intolerable to her proud and sensitive nature. Yet even this might have been endured, had it not been for the new anxiety caused by Vanessa's residence in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Swift was undoubtedly flattered by the passionate attachment of this foolish young woman, and, embarrassing as he must have found it, he continued to visit her at Celbridge and direct her literary studies with all the interest of a warm friend. That Swift's action both now and for years after was cruel to both women may not be denied; but it was especially cruel to the older woman. And that Stella should have determined that at all events Swift should never marry Vanessa, is a quite intelligible resolution on her part. Even if she was never to be the acknowledged wife of the man she loved, no one else should be.

The secret marriage, if it took place—as on the whole seems likely—was evidently, as Sheridan represents it to be, a compromise between Swift's wishes and those of Stella. He was willing to give her the assurance which she desired that he would never marry anyone else, but he was inflexible in his determination that they should live apart, as heretofore, and also that their union should not be acknowledged to the world.¹ The latter condition was almost a necessary consequence of the former one, for married people cannot live separate lives without setting the tongue of scandal wagging. And so, for years, they lived as dear friends, but no more, no man daring to question the propriety of their relations or their title to the respect and esteem of their acquaintance.

Yet the secret was suspected, and it was believed that they were man and wife, although no one could prove it, for Bishop Ashe had died in 1718. And at last, in 1723, Vanessa, to whose ears the tale had come, died in her grief and vexation. That she believed Swift and Stella to have been married is very clear (we have the contemporary evidence of Dr. Evans to this effect), and no one in the world could have been more deeply interested in discovering the truth. No woman in her situation would have accepted unverified gossip on a point which touched her so nearly, for less than two years before Swift had written her that "Cadenus . . . continues to esteem and love and value you above all things and so will do to the end of his life; but at the same time entreats that you would not make yourself or him unhappy by imaginations."¹ The dramatic story which Sheridan² tells of the way in which she discovered the truth is so familiar that it need hardly be repeated here—how she wrote to Stella to ask her if she really were Swift's wife—how Stella replied in the affirmative and then sent Vanessa's query to the Dean—how he furiously rode to Celbridge and, flinging her own letter before her, left Vanessa for ever. This is not unlikely, in itself; and in substance, it is identical with the story told thirty years before by Orrery,³ save that the offending letter of inquiry, according to this author, was addressed to Swift himself directly. It can hardly be doubted, whatever may be thought of some of these details, that Vanessa became convinced shortly before her unhappy death that her passion was hopeless, because Swift was a married man.

The publication of "Cadenus and Vanessa" in 1726 must have been a blow to Stella, as a perusal of its pages would disclose how much more intimate had been the friendship between the Dean and Miss Vanhomrigh, than she had supposed. But the end was drawing near, and the long months of her illness were months of agony to Swift. "There is not a greater folly," he wrote, in the bitterness of his soul, "than to contract too great and intimate a friendship, which must always leave the survivor miserable."⁴ "I am determined not to go to Ireland to find her just dead, or dying." And yet the months passed by, and she still lingered. Sheridan tells a story of a painful interview during this last illness between Stella and Swift, which was witnessed by his father. It is to the effect that she begged the Dean at the last to give her the poor consolation of acknowledging her as his wife, now that she lay on her death-bed, and that Swift refused. If this must be believed, it tells heavily against Swift. But a much more likely version of the interview¹ is found in Delany's "Observations," which makes the offer to acknowledge the marriage proceed from the Dean, an offer which Stella rejected as coming "too late." At any rate, whatever the reason was and whether there were anything to "acknowledge" or no, the marriage of Swift and Stella remained, and remains, a secret; and Stella went down to her grave as "Esther Johnson, spinster."

"This day, being Sunday, January 28, 1727-8, about eight o'clock at night, a servant brought me a note with an account of the death of the truest, most virtuous, and valuable friend that I, or perhaps any other person ever was blessed with." And so the lonely man sat down in his grief to write for posterity "something of her life and character." "Never was any of her sex born with better gifts of the mind or more improved them by reading and conversation. . . . She had a gracefulness somewhat more than human, in every motion, word and action. Never was so happy a conjunction of civility, freedom, easiness and sincerity. There seemed to be a combination among all that knew her, to treat her with a dignity much beyond her rank; yet people of all sorts were never more easy than in her company. . . . January 30, Tuesday. This is the night of the funeral, which my sickness will not suffer me to attend. It is now nine at night; and I am removed into another apartment that I may not see the light in the church, which is just over against the window of my bedchamber."

She lies in the nave of St. Patrick's Cathedral, where Swift was buried beside her nearly eighteen years afterwards. And when his long struggle was ended, and his confidential documents came to be examined, one of Stella's brown tresses was discovered wrapt in a paper with the inscription "Only a woman's hair." He may have been cruel, but he was a true lover, and he loved to the end.

NOTE

AN attempt has been made in the following pages to describe all the editions of Swift's writings, whether separate or collected, published before the end of the eighteenth century. Editions of later date have been excluded, unless individually of particular value, as it was felt that a list, for instance, of numerous more or less abridged and expurgated editions of "Gulliver's Travels" would fill many pages of type to no good purpose.

However imperfect this catalogue may be it would have been more so but for the kind assistance of other workers in the same field. The present writer has to express his obligations to Mr. Elliot Stock for permission to make use of Dr. Stanley Lane Poole's "Notes for a Bibliography of Swift," published in The Bibliographer for November, 1884, to the late Mr. C. Litton Falkiner, whose untimely death has occurred as these pages were passing through the press, for particulars as to many of the editions in Trinity College Library, Dublin, to Mr. F. C. Wellstood of the Bodleian Library and to Mr. H. W. Rutherford of the University Library, Cambridge, for research in their respective collections, to the Librarians of the Forster and Dyce collections at the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington, the Guildhall Library, Sion College Library, and the Lambeth Palace Library for facilitating the examination of the scarce editions under their charge, and last, but not least, to the staff of the British Museum Library for their ready help and untiring courtesy in providing the very large number of volumes that have been called for.

All the editions described as in London libraries have been examined for the purpose of this Bibliography by the present writer; for the Bodleian and the Trinity College libraries he has used the printed catalogues, supplemented by information from the gentlemen named above; for the Advocates' Library he has relied on the printed catalogue; in the case of the Cambridge University Library, of which there is no published catalogue, all the references have been supplied by Mr. Rutherford; and for the libraries at the Royal Irish Academy and the King's Inns, Dublin, he is entirely dependent on the Bibliography of Dr. S. L. Poole, with the exception of one or two doubtful points which have been cleared up by Mr. C. L. Falkiner.

The pitfalls for the unwary in Swift bibliography are innumerable; nearly all his writings appeared anonymously, printers obtaining manuscripts which could be rightly or wrongly attributed to him had no hesitation in issuing them, the lack of international copyright between England and Ireland allowed any thing first published in either country to be freely reprinted in the other, spurious editions were issued "for the benefit of the poor," different editions of the same work seem to defy a decision as to which was the original, e.g., the First and Second Drapier Letters met with such an unexpected demand that they had to be hurriedly reprinted after the type had been distributed, the copies formerly in the possession of the late Colonel Grant and those in the British Museum differing in almost every line, while it is impossible to decide which is the earlier issue. Under these circumstances, where complete success is not to be expected, the present attempt has been put forth, and the writer will be glad if his efforts should be the means of eliciting authentic information on any doubtful point.

P. 9, at end of paragraph: [or such as employ him,] who ought not to have forgot that in the late persecution of Forbes for reflecting on K. William, the Archbishop did so distinguish himself, that the City gave him their public thanks.

P. 14, the first paragraph should continue: Now, because that gentleman is ambitious to be thought one of our patriots, I can put him upon a much better way of serving his country, which is to take some course that himself and his whole worthy family may be hanged to-morrow morning; and if this had been done (How long is it since my Lord Capel's government?) about fifteen years ago, our miserable betrayed kingdom had been some millions the better.

P. 15, line 6 from bottom, after "Test;" add: "I never heard of above one or two at most whom there was the least ground to suspect,".

P. 16, line 27, add these paragraphs:

You indeed hint something to me about two divines of this kingdom now in London, which seems to differ from what I said of the rest. I have not the honour to be acquainted with either, and I think they have not been much among us; but by what I have heard of them, I do not believe they are one degree greater Whigs than five hundred of their brethren, and I have heard that one of them (who is, they say, made chief chaplain to our new Governor) has always declared against repealing the Test; he is reckoned a worthy person, and I know not how it can be consistent with that character to employ his pen either in a public or private manner against his opinion, neither do I think he designs it. As for the other divine, we all expected here that he was to be the person his Excellency would bring over his chaplain: But since that hath otherwise happened, it may not be altogether improbable that his great friends have dropped him, which disappointment, if he be a right c—r—r may chance to cool his zeal that way, if he had any before, of which I cannot accuse him. However that be, he will find it a difficult matter, with his skill in politics, or talent at ridicule, backed by all the wit he is said to be master of, to reason or laugh us out of the Sacramental Test; and will find by the event that my Predictions are truer than his.

But if I am mistaken in my sentiments of those two divines, there is a third now among you, of as much consideration as either, and as good a Whig in all the necessary fundamentals, from whose opinion you may form a truer judgement of his brethren here; and I dare engage he will not be reserved in owning them, and besides he has reason to know as much of our House of Commons as any of its Members, his office giving him free access there at all times.

P. 22, after the last paragraph, add:

For the other part of your letter I can only tell you, that I have obeyed your commands as far as it was in my power, and I hope well enough to encourage you to honour me with more.

The Works of Jonathan Swift, D.D. Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, Accurately revised In Six Volumes, . . . London, Printed for C. Bathurst, . . . MDCCLV. [4to]

The Works . . . In Twelve Volumes, . . . MDCCLV. [8vo]

This handsome edition of Swift's Works was commenced in 1754 or 1755 by the publication of six volumes of the quarto edition, and twelve volumes of the octavo edition in the same size type. Six more volumes (vii, viii, and x to xiii) of the quarto edition, and ten corresponding volumes of the octavo, were issued between 1762 and 1768, volume ix, quarto (which is only partially represented by volume xvii, octavo) in 1775, and the Supplement (volume xiv, quarto, and volumes xxiv and xxv, octavo) in 1776 and 1779. Corresponding editions followed in twenty-seven volumes, small octavo and 18mo, which did not include the pieces contained in the quarto volume of 1775. The volumes of the small octavo edition corresponding to volume vii of the quarto are dated 1762 in the copy at Bodl. and 1766 at the B.M.

It is difficult to fix the date when Dr. Hawkesworth commenced the publication of this edition, as volume i in octavo is dated 1755 on the title-page, but 1754 on the title of "A Tale of a Tub," which occupies the greater part of the volume, and volumes ii to ix are dated 1754, but in the quarto the first six volumes are all dated 1755 on the title, though here also the title-page of "A Tale of a Tub" in volume i bears the date 1754.

The Best Practical Working Dictionary of the English Language.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

2348 PAGES. 5000 ILLUSTRATIONS.

NEW EDITION, REVISED THROUGHOUT WITH A NEW SUPPLEMENT OF 25,000 ADDITIONAL WORDS AND PHRASES.

The Appendices comprise a Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World, Vocabularies of Scripture, Greek, Latin, and English Proper Names, a Dictionary of the Noted Names of Fiction, a Brief History of the English Language, a Dictionary of Foreign Quotations, Words, Phrases, Proverbs, &c., a Biographical Dictionary with 10,000 names, &c., &c.

Dr. MURRAY, Editor of the 'Oxford English Dictionary,' says :—'In this its latest form, and with its large Supplement and numerous appendices, it is a wonderful volume, which well maintains its ground against all rivals on its own lines. The 'definitions,' or more properly, 'explanations of meaning' in 'Webster' have always struck me as particularly terse and well-put; and it is hard to see how anything better could be done within the limits.'

Professor JOSEPH WRIGHT, M.A., Ph.D., D.C.L., LL.D., Editor of the 'English Dialect Dictionary,' says :—'The new edition of "Webster's International Dictionary" is undoubtedly the most useful and reliable work of its kind in any country. No one who has not examined the work carefully would believe that such a vast amount of lexicographical information could possibly be found within so small a compass.'

Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, D.D., Head Master of Harrow, says :—'I have always thought very highly of its merits. Indeed, I consider it to be far the most accurate English Dictionary in existence, and much more reliable than the "Century." For daily and hourly reference, "Webster" seems to me unrivalled.'
